Have You Taken a Personal Property Inventory Lately?

An Inventory for insurance records should list all your possessions

You—and millions of others, too—soon will be taking that trip, to the country, the vacation at the lake, the two weeks at the shore. Most likely you'll return home to find the place exactly as you left it.

Or will you?

Some, unfortunately, will not.

They will find that fire, possibly windstorm or other disaster struck in their absence. Or the premises looted.

Most likely they had insurance . . . but did they have enough?

And how about yourself?

Unless you have increased the amount of your policy recently, you may be in for a shock! Fire insurance loss adjusters tell us that many persons are woefully underinsured. Even though the amount of insurance was adequate, when the policy was written some years ago, it may not be adequate today.

Result: There's not enough to cover losses, after disaster strikes.

So wouldn't it be to your advantage now—before you take that promised vacation—to make up an inventory of personal property?

Your inventory will be helpful in arriving at a satisfactory settlement of loss because it will remind you of each item of personal property involved. Also, it will enable you to bring the extent of your insurable coverages up to date and establish current insurable values. In the last 10 years, for instance, building costs have doubled and not all people have kept their insurance in step with rising values.

Ask your agent about this. Also, ask your agent for a household inventory form. Fill it out today. Then you will enjoy your vacation.

How to Make an Inventory

Do not guess at values. If you want to arrive at a fair figure put down the replacement cost, estimate the life of the article and deduct a percentage indicated by the remaining use-value of the item.

If you have fine arts, jewelry, furs, or valuable books or curio collections, they should be itemized and specifically scheduled at their actual appraised value in your insurance policies.

Vehicles, such as automobiles and boats, are never included in fire or personal property policies but should be insured separately.

Don't trust your memory. Take each room separately—go into that room and list everything in it. FNS
