LANDMARKS OF THE PLATTE

Old Forts and Trading Posts in the Vicinity of Denver.

MONUMENTS OF WESTERN PIONEERS

Dr. Coues and Governor Adams Visit Historic Spots in Colorado—Traces of the Past in the Ruins of Today—Crumbling Landmarks.

DENVER, July 3.—(Special.)—Within a range of fourteen miles north and south, in the beautiful valley of the Platte river, is one of the most interesting historical localities in the west. The traveler who passes through this charming region is carried irresistibly back to the days of the early trappers and fur traders, to the voyagers and adventurers, the explorers and hunters, and later to the daring men and women who left friends and comfort in the far off east to seek a new world of conquest under the shadow of the mountains. The field is one teeming with romance and yet to thousands living in the city of Denver and vicinity it is unknown.

The presence in the city of Dr. Elliott Coues, the celebrated scientist and historian of the west, promises to bring into the prominence it deserves the early history of the Platte valley. Dr. Coues, accompanied by Governor Alva Adams and a party organized especially for the purpose, visited several of the historic spots and started an investigation which may clear away clouds which have overhung a period in the development of the state, to which little attention has been paid. It is possible that as a result of the inquiries now set on foot the time may come when the historic spots of Colorado will be marked by some enduring monument. By many it is thought that romance belongs distinctively to the southwest. New Mexico and Arizona have been acknowledged as the field to which the mind may turn in periods of dreamy reflection, but Colorado presents no such attractions. A trip through the Platte valley with Governor Adams or Dr. Coues would quickly dissipate an illusion of the kind referred to.

Three Early Trading Posts.

This tour of investigation included a visit to three of the early trading posts in the vicinity of Denver and within easy access of every person desirous of investigating the history of the state previous to the advent of the gold hunters. It would be an interesting thing to know who was the first white man that ever traversed the valley of the Platte, but the name of that individual will remain forever wrapped in oblivion. From authentic sources it is acknowledged that quite early in the present century the hardy fur traders were trapping beaver in the streams that flow from the Rocky mountains. Lewis and Clark in
