Spain's friends in Europe have come to the conclusion that her power of resistance to the United States is ended. "Peace at any price" is the advice that is given to the statesmen at Madrid from all European capitals.

But what shall the price of peace be? Uncle Sam must answer that question. It is for him to name the amount of the indemnity. Since nations first began to fight the rule which compels the defeated to pay roundly for defeat has prevailed. "So much of your territory and so much of your money" has been invariably the final word of the conqueror to the conquered.

In the earlier wars of the century some notable precedents have been made from which an idea may be formed of the size of the bill shortly to be made out by the United States against Spain. The principle followed has been that both in territory and in cash the defeated nation is liable to pay for its experience. A far-off but famous illustration of this principle is found in the terms of peace dictated by the allied powers of Europe to France, after the fall of Napoleon at Waterloo. Not only were various pieces of French territory appropriated, but her important frontier fortresses were held for five years by an "army of occupation" which the French treasury was made to pay and support.

As a result of the three wars between Great
