Desperate Desmond

No Hero, However Durable, Could Withstand the Impact of a Hodful of Bricks

By Hershfield

Copyright, 1911, National News Ass'n.

How many times has poor Claude, after being on the top of the wall, had to look up again from the ground and see Desmond with Rosamond in his power looking down at him with a sneer? And once more the unlucky hero is in the same position. It takes a game hero to stand all this, but Claude is there with the necessary grit.

Claude, running rapidly around the wall in the hope of finding some way to scale it, suddenly comes across a hole in the masonry. Desmond, in his careful watch of the top of the wall, entirely overlooked this possibility, and Claude now seems certain to get inside and baffle the villain. His heart bounds like a rubber ball.

Luck now appears to have turned. The wheel of fortune has swung around, so Claude thinks, and he is now at the top instead of the bottom of the wheel. Hastily he begins to crawl through the hole this opportunity found. Already he sees his beautiful Rosamond in his arms again, and the villain effectually baffled.

Alas, fortune is a fickle jade. That breach in the wall was a calamity in the guise of a blessing. Just as Claude is going through into the city, a hardy Chinese bricklayer, who should have mended the hole long before, drops a hod of bricks smack upon our unlucky hero. The fates are indeed against Claude Eclaire, lover and hero.

Claude is inside the city wall at last, but in a wounded and unconscious condition. Desmond sees the hero carried in on a stretcher by the Chinese, who have kinder hearts than Desmond, that disgrace to the Caucasian race. The villain draws his gun and commands the stretcher bearers to halt and turn over Claude to him.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "and I've got Claude trussed up like a turkey." The villain forces the lovely Rosamond to carry one end of the stretcher, and to run away with Claude from the Chinese who would aid him. It is a cruel situation for a tender-hearted girl, but she may escape from it in tomorrow's picture.
