"Teamster Jim."

It ain't just the story, parson, to tell in a crowd like this,
With the virtuous matron a fervently fan'
chidin' the gamblin man,
An' the good old deacon a nodin' in time
with his pattern snore,
An' the shocked sinner of the capital, makin'
way through the door.

But then, it's a story that happened, an'
every word of it's true,
An' sometimes we can't help talkin' of the things that we ought to do.
An' though good society oughtn't to throw onto "Teamster Jim," I'm thinkin' there's lots worse people that's better known than him.

I mind the day he was married, an' I danced
at the weddin', too;
An' I kissed the bride, sweet Maggie—daughter
ter of Ben McGrew.
I mind how they set up housekeepin' two
young, poor, happy fools;
When Jim's only stock was a heavy team of four Kaintucky mules.

Well, they lived along contented, with
little joy an' cares,
An' every year a baby come, and twice
come in pairs;
Till the house was full of children, with
shoutin' and playin' and squalls,
An' their singin' and laughin' an' cryin' was Bedlam within its walls.

An' Jim, he seemed to like it, an'
his evenins' at home.
He said it was full of peace from pit to

they will find the steps of "high life" hard to climb. Those who come under this description will have no difficulty.
If they are in the first category,
in spite of certain morbid writers,
still rare in England, they may
