Winter Rye Proves Good Crop in Dakota

PIERRE, S. D., June 28.—(Special.)—While this part of the state has largely dropped out of the raising of small grain, with fodder crops, corn and live stock as the main line of agricultural endeavor, there are yet a number of acres of different classes of small grain to be cared for, and this is reported to be in the best possible condition. Several of the ranchers have tried out winter rye for several years until they find it will go through without winter killing, and several fields of this grain is just about ready for harvest, the cutting to begin next week.

At the Steele and Gowdy ranch near old Fort Sully one field of 160 acres of winter rye is reported to show an immense yield and the harvesters will start at the first of the coming week, while other fields on the Wadleigh, and other ranches will soon be ready. This with the harvest of alfalfa and wild hay will keep men in the fields from now until late in the summer, the hay crop being the best for years, and preparations being made for the stacking of thousands of tons.
