INTERESTS OF RURAL CLASSES

Welfare of Rural Communities Important to Entire Republic.

DETERMINE OUR NATIONAL CHARACTER

For Its Continuance and Strength the Union Requires That the Rural Classes Should Thrive and Prosper.

Following is an abstract of the address delivered by Chancellor Andrews of the University of Nebraska at the Nebraska Dairymen's meeting at Lincoln:

Two great movements are now progressing in the United States, which have extraordinary social importance. One is the rush of population into cities; the other, the syndicating of most wealth in a manner which threatens to lower the fortunes of the rural classes. These classes, being among those which cannot combine, have to sell their products competitively, whereas for most things which they buy they must pay syndicate prices. These two movements are so sweeping and in their effects so decisive that some thinkers regard them as destined to reduce the rural population of America to ignorant peasants such as we see and pity in most European lands. That result every true American would wish to avoid.

Whether or not the danger is so great as alleged we need not inquire; one thing is certain, that the welfare of rural communities is no mere affair of those communities alone, but is important to the entire republic. For its continuance and strength the whole nation requires that the rural classes should thrive. As those classes are, so is the state.

A vigorous country population is necessary in order to the highest physical health throughout the total body of citizens. It is equally necessary to the finest average character and integrity of the whole people, and also for the richest development of common sense, sincerity, large views and patriotism. These qualities spring from "Mother Earth." They are found in cities, of course, but usually because they are brought there. The strongest instances of them are not indigenous in towns. It is generally recognized that town life would soon grow pale and sickly, as well in moral as in physical regards, but for incessant importation of blood and character from the country. It is a matter of common knowledge that nearly all the men and women in the most commanding positions in society, business, literature and life were born and reared in the country.

Over and above the preceding considerations, which apply to other countries as well as our own, there is a special reason for conserving and strengthening rural interests here in the United States. Europe was settled mainly under military motives, so that all over Europe the great landowner is even today a more significant person than the great townsman, manufacturer or banker. Socially, landowning counts there more than wealth in other form. The blooded aristocracies of European lands all stand in some sort of connection with the proprietorship of land. It is easy to see that in the countries named there is an immense influence other than that of wealth operating against that of mere wealth. In the United States, unfortunately, we as yet possess no such counterpoise against the dead weight of mammon. We need to raise up such; and the only apparent way, at least the best way, apparently, to accomplish that result is to cultivate rural interests. Build up and keep up a country population both worthy and able to determine our national character.

How can such a country population in the United States be reared? How can the landed interest be put in a condition to be felt as a solid factor in American civilization, always to be reckoned with, opposing in every appropriate way the rule of brute mammon and the sway of those decadent and effete elements always so active in great municipalities? How can we establish country life and character so that it shall be a beneficent safety valve, fly-wheel or governor to our vast social machine?

First—Good legislation is called for—directed not to the financial profit of the farming class, which would be class legislation and therefore wrong, but caluculated in a large and enlightened manner to render stronger, happier and more cheerful the people who live out upon the land and furnish the bone and sinew, also in great part the brain and character of the American people. Laws in this spirit would not deserve condemnation as class legislation. Their fundamental aim would not be the welfare of a class. They would not have in view the good of the country for its own sake, but country prosperity for the sake of the entire nation, the idea being that the character, morality, ability and consequently safety of the nation would immensely sink should the country population fall to the level of serfs or peasants.

Second—Perfect roads. The advantages to rural districts from this source would be incalculable. The time is coming when in all well-populated sections travel will be so swift and comfortable and the entire population of a country can, daytime or ev
