The Frontier Woman

Let's Talk About Stains

By BLANCHE SPANN PEASE, Homemaking Editor

For every woman who does her own home laundry, the problem of stains and what to do about them comes up sooner or later. Perhaps today you'd like to have me pass along some suggestions on this subject.

For egg stains, scrape off as much of the stain as possible with a silver knife. Sponge with cold water and launder and then if the stain remains, bleach. That usually works for cotton and linen fabrics but if the stain is on some modern fabric of washable wool, you will probably want to sponge first with cold water, and when dry, sponge with carbon tetrachloride.

When summer comes, mothers will be plagued with the children getting grass stains, green vegetable stains and foliage stains on clothing. If it's cotton or linen clothing, rub with hot soapy water and use a bleach for stain removing after laundering. If the grass stain is on a modern fabric or a washable wool, sponge the stain with alcohol and use diluted alcohol only on acetate rayon.

Coffee stains are aways with us it seems. Usually laundering cotton or linen will do the trick with good results, if stain remains, bleach. If it's on the more modern fabric, try sponging with lukewarm water, and then if any stain remains, use hydrogen peroxide. Grease spots from cream can be removed with tetrachloride.

If the youngsters get chewing gum or adhesive tape on their cotton or linen clothing, try sponging with carbon tetrachloride and then launder. On the more modern fabrics, you'll probably have to use carbon tetrachloride.

To remove blood stains from cotton or linen, sponge with cold water, and if stain remains, soak in weak ammonia water. On the modern fabrics, sponge with cold water and if stain remains use hydrogen peroxide.

Chocolate or cocoa stains are others that homemakers must frequently contend with. Wash these in warm sudsy water, if the stain persists, sponge with hydrogen peroxide. Sponge with carbon tetrachloride if the stain is on washable wool or modern fabrics. If stain remains, use hydrogen peroxide.

When using solvents on modern fabrics and wool, test a small sample of the material as a precaution before cleaning the garment. Use diluted alcohol (1 part alcohol and 2 parts water) only on acetate rayon. Use a sodium perborate bleach such as Snowy or Dexol to bleach colored fabrics, and washable wool.

To remove fruit stains on cotton and linen, spread cloth over bowl, stretching it and pour boiling water on the stain. If stain remains use lemon juice or one of the chemical bleaches.

Treat peach, pear, cherry or plum stains by sponging well in cool water, working glycerine into stain. Do not use soap. Let stand several hours, then add a few drops of white vinegar and rinse thoroughly.

If the fruit stains are on washable wool or any of the new modern fabrics, treat as for the peach, pear, cherry and plum stains on cotton.

Grease and oils are other stains quite prevalent to be dealt with in home laundry. For cotton garments, scrape off as much grease as possible. Wash in warm, sudsy water. Use plenty of detergent on the stained area and rub well between the hands. If you get grease and oil on fabrics made of dacron, rub a liquid detergent into the stain with the finger tips. Avoid vigorous scrubbing because of possible damage to the material.

For other modern fabrics and washable wool, stained with grease and oil, sponge with carbon tetrachloride to remove the spots. Work from the outside of spot to center, being careful not to leave a definite ring of solvent on the material.

Lipstick and rouge are common stains. Loosen the stain with lard or cold cream, launder as usual for cottons and linens. On modern fabrics, try rubbing with lard or cold cream, then sponging with carbon tetrachloride.

Next week, we'll deal with more stains. In the meantime, we'd like to have your letters for The Frontier Woman. For each letter from readers, which we use in this department, we will award a three months' subscription to the Frontier. You may write about anything you like. You may sign a pen name if you like, but please include your own name and address with the letter, for your editors benefit.

Your favorite recipes and ideas are particularly welcome subjects for your letters. Send them to Mrs. Blanche Spann Pease, Atkinson, Nebr. Be sure you put the Frontier Woman notation on your letter.
