Desperate Desmond

Never Since Eden Has an Apple Tree Been the Cause of Such Disturbance

Copyright, 1911, National News Association.

By Hershfield

There is only one thing sure about luck, and that is that it is bound to change sooner or later. Our story opens to-day with the villain Desmond dangling over the same stove which he had meant for Claude's torture some hours before. Poetic justice, this, as we may pause to remark while the villain is beginning to feel the heat that is to do him to a turn.

Above the hollow where the stove is situated grows a fine apple tree. The heat rising naturally bakes the apples, and as baked apples have virtually no clinging power, they just as naturally fall down in a shower. What, you may ask, have baked apples to do with villainy? The question is natural enough, for the man who eats apples, especially baked apples, is usually a good man.

Continuing, we call your attention to the fact that you never read of a noted criminal eating a baked apple before committing a burglary or whatever particular crime he most fancies. The fact that a party of treacherous Arabs gets wind of these baked apples and hurries for them does not upset what we have said. These Arabs are starving. Their natural food is not apples.

Of course, as the Arabs madly rush upon this unexpected windfall of baked apples they discover Desmond. (Here you see what connection there was between villainy and the fruit.) Recognizing a kindred spirit, the outlaws of the desert promptly begin an attack on Claude and his friends, greatly to the joy of Desmond, who was beginning to feel like a bear on a hot plate.

Ah! a bullet has severed the rope which suspended the villain above the stove, and he is ready to escape during the melee. But he has reckoned without his hostess. Beautiful Rosamond, as brave as she is fair, produces a hatpin and commands the scoundrel to surrender. Desperate as he is, the villain dare not disobey her command, and she marches him off.

It is hard enough to keep your courage up, but far harder to keep your feet up, as Desmond now discovers. As Rosamond has arranged it, the rogue, the moment he fails to keep his feet in the air, will pull the trigger of a gun and shoot himself. "I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "but I've got big feet." To-morrow's pictures show his fate.
