Jack and Jill

JILL was all adimple with smiles when Jack came home from the office and she ran to meet him. He kissed her coldly and mechanically.

"Why, what is the matter?" demanded Jill, a little hurt.

"Nothing," was the surly answer.

"Don't you feel well, hon'?"

He shrugged.

"Aw, I feel all right."

He went on to the bath room and she heard the steady slapslap of his razor against the leather strop.

She stood in the doorway as he lathered his face.

"We've got fried onions for supper, dear," she said presently.

"I smell 'em," replier Jack, shortly.

Jill tried to think of something really important, or at least interesting to say, but her effort was without tangible result.

He scraped at his chin relentlessly holding his tongue.

"Nothing wrong at the office?"

He groaned an inarticulate reply.

"Sure you haven't a headache or something, dear? Want some spirits of ammonia?"

Jack stopped, the razor in mid-air, and scowled blackly at her.

"Will you go 'way and let me shave?" he demanded ruefully.

Jill flounced away with a toss of her pretty head.

"Aren't women the limit? demanded Jack of his image reflected in the mirror.

The dinner was a success but Jack didn't thaw worth a cent.

As he sipped his coffee and smoked his cigarette rather despondently it seemed to Jill, he remained gloomily silent.

Jill skirted the table and sat down in his lap. It had been a week since she had claimed this wifely privilege.

"Honey," she pouted.

"What?"

"Please confide in me, dear," she urged, kissing him lightly on the cheek.

"Confide?" he snorted impolitely. "What in the name of heaven are you talking about?"

"It isn't trouble at the office?"

"No."

"It isn't money matters, is it? Am I spending too much?"

"Oh, of course not; don't be silly, Jill."

"Well, honey, I just know it's something. I have felt it ever since you came home. I'm really psychic, you know, Jack, and just as soon as I saw you tonight I knew it was something dreadful. Can't your little Jill help?"

"Not a bit."

"Oh, oh, oh!" she wailed. "I just knew it was something. Please, dear, if you love me a little bit tell me what it is."

"Well, if I tell you will you keep quiet for the rest of the night?" he demanded crossly, impatiently.

She nodded and her eyes widened with anticipation.

Brides just love dreadful catastrophes—at first.

"Well, if you must know—"

"Yes, yes!"

"I've been enduring agony all day long."

"Oh you poor boy; tell me is it a woman?"

Jack groaned and clutched a lock of his hair in a frenzied grip.

"No!" he shouted. "That back tooth is killing me again. Now for the love of heaven shut up."

She didn't speak again for one hour and five minutes.

Romance in Origin Of Superstitions

By FRANK H. SIMONDS.

Birds on Wedding Gifts.

In many parts of the country it is considered unlucky to receive as a wedding gift anything with birds depicted on it. This arises from an association of ideas—a primitive conception of relations and, therefore, cause and effect, sympathetic magic of a sort. Birds suggest flight—something fleeting—and for the married state permanency is desirable. Therefore the wedding gift should not suggest impermanency or it will produce impermanency. The superstition is ancient; it is found in other countries. It is obviously primitive.

Those superstitions which are clearly of a primitive origin present a most interesting problem in their survival. They were the primitive man's science. They were the best he could do with his defective system of ratiocination to explain the phenomena by which he was surrounded. But to the civilized man of today they are so far from being the offspring of his reasoning that they are directly opposed to it. It might be supposed that when the stage of intellectual life which produced superstitions had been passed—had died out under civilization—the superstitions evolved from that stage would die with it. But such is not the case. It has been said that in the past hundred years there has been a great decline in popular superstition. But this is, to a great extent, merely on the surface. The cultivated classes have become ashamed of their superstitions but they have by no means abandoned them.

It may be said that these superstitions have been handed down from generation to generation to account for their persistence. But unless there is some other quality to sustain it a conception handed down becomes void when enlarged experience and more perfect reasoning disproves it. The conception of the earth as a plane was handed down for ages but when experience proved the fallacy of this conception it ceased to exist. Primitive superstitions are as much opposed to modern experience and reason as the conception of the earth as a plane, yet they persist with astonishing vitality. Modern ratiocination and primitive superstition would appear to be incompatable, yet they exist side by side. What is the answer?
