MEERSCHAUM AND AMBER

Facts About Both Articles that Most Smokers Do Not Know.

New York Sun.

For the past five years the importportation of crude meerschaum and amber into this country has steadily increased. In former years ptpes and smokers' articles comprised the sole entries of meerschaum and amber at the New York custom house. The government levies a duty of $1.50 per gross and 75 per cent ad valorem on the manufactured article, while the raw material is admitted free. Vienna is the headquarters of the meerschaum industry. Five years ago a Chambers street firm brought over, as an experiment, Austrian artisans to fashion the crude meerschaum blocks into pipes. The experiment proved a success, and now there are five or six new York factories, employing about 200 workmen, that turn out first-class meerschaum work.

The crude meerschaum comes from Kiltschik and Esk-Schehr in Anatobia, in Asia Minor, where it is found loose or embodied in chalky, serpentine rocks. In size it varies from the dimensions of a walnut to that of a man's head. When it is first mined it is soft, but it becomes hard when exposed to the air. In its virgin state it cracks very easily. The business of mining and marketing meerschaum is entirely under the control of Armenians. They are shrewd traders and can discount a vender of wooden hams and nutmegs at his own trade. For self-protection buyers have insisted on the putting of the raw productf into marketable shape, so so that some idea of the value of the goods can be ascertained on sight. The crude blocks of meerschaum are therefore slightly waxed and polished so that the grain can be readily seen The market is at Vienna, where the Armenian producers have established agencies, and where the whole world goes to buy. In marketable shape, meerschaum is assorted in four sizes. The largest size has about thirty-five pieces to the case, the second averages seventy-five pieces, the third about 175 pieces, and the fourth from 300 to 500 pieces. Each size again is graded in eight or nine qualities. A popular notion is that meerschaum is sold by weight. If such were the case the "light" pounds would be in great demand. Connoisseurs prefer a block neither too light nor too heavy. If too light, the meerschaum is porous and will absorb too much nocotine. If too heavy, it will not color well. American workmen have not yet been found to successfully manipulate the raw material. All the workmen employed in the industry have been brought over from Austria. They earn big wages, and are secretive with their handicraft.

The process of manufacturing meerschaum pipes requires both skill and practice. The blocks are first roughly cut into the shape of a pipe. They are then dipped into water, and while wet are turned on a lathe. The eye is the only guide to produce evenness and symmetry. After the lather has completed his work the pipes are rubbed smooth, a reed found in the marshes of Hoboken, with a fine velvety surface, being used as a file. When all the scratches are removed and a perfectly smooth surface is presented, the article is dipped into hot wax, left a few minutes there, and then polished with a rag. Right there is a point for smokers. When purchasing a meerschaum article always select one having a yellow tinge. A A yellow shade shows that the meerschaum is sufficiently porous to absorb wax, and therefore it will readily color from nicotine. A white meerschaum pipe or cigar-holder shows density sufficient to resist absorption. The best article is not too yellow, but what may be termed just yellow enough.

If the government imposed a duty on amber in its crude state, the custom house receipts would be considerably increased. The authorities, however, class amber as a chemical and admit it free of duty under the heading of gum. For the fiscal year ended June 30 last, $42,490 worth of amber was brought into the port of New York. The best authorities in the trade agree in asserting that amber is fossilized rosin. In course of time, it is said, with our immense pine forests it is possible that amber may be found in this country. At present the deposit of amber is almost wholly confined o tthe shores of the Baltic sea. Some is washed up by the sea free of cost, but the majority is mined from the cliffs adjacent to Dantzic. Amber sold by weight. The smallest size numbers about 250 pieces to the pound, and costs $1.50. Where there are two to four pieces to the pound it costs $30 to $40. Amber of greenish hue is the most valuable, and a black gum, supposed to be amber, comes next in value. The popular supposition that cloudy amber is of more value than clear is not supported by fact. Cloudy amber is stronger, and it obscures nicotine stains, and is therefore to be preferred; but clear amber is prettier, and is always in demand. A combination of green, black, clear and cloudy amber in a cigar-holder was exhibited to the reporter. It was beautiful and novel. Amber is readily worked into shape with the aid of fine sand and burnishing wheels. It can be softened by heat with the use of oil to keep it from burning, and when ductile can be bent as easily as horn. It is also susceptible of high polish.

Amber is principally expensive on account of the waste in its manufacture for smokers' use, and rubber, celluloid and various other compositions have been found to be good and cheap substitutes A prominent retailer on Broadway said: "The time was when only a capitalist could afford to smoke a meerschaum pipe. About Christmas our trade was brisk, and occasional raffles enabled a dealer to work off a stock that otherwise would remain in his case from year to year. Now we have no trouble in selling meerschaum pipes and holders. There is a steady and natural demand for them. I find the greater variance in tastes for pipes between the city and country folks. As a general rule a city man purchases a pipe from motives of economy. He wants a good pipe, and doesn't hesitate to purchase a meerschaum. Sometimes a city man buys a pipe because it has a novel shape, but, as a rule, a desire to economize leads to the abandonment of cigars and the use of a pipe. Sooner or later, however, the pipe is discarded in favor of cigars. With a countryman things are different. He buys a pipe for daily use, and really prefers it to a cigar."

Other manufacturers said that, notwithstanding the enormous increase of the manufacture of cigars, the demand for pipes is not curtailed. One dealer said that the demand for pipes is now 25 per cent greater than five years ago and he thought pipes would always sell, on account of economy and their Americanized shapes. The styles of pipes are legion, but the favorite style in demand with smokers is the "London," a pipe with an egg bowl and a straight stem.

Never too Late to Mend.

Thos. J. Arden, William Street, East Buffalo, writes: "Your SPRING BLOSSOM has worked on me splendid, I had no appetite; used to sleep badly and get up in the morning unrefreshed; my breath was very offensive and I suffered from severe headache; since using your Spring Blossom all these symptoms have vanished, and I feel quite well." Price 50 cents, trial bottle 10 cents.

A FREAK OF DARE-DEVILS.

How a Squadron of Federal Cavalry Attacked Heth's Whole Division.

J. H. Moore in Philadelphia Times.

We daily anticipated an attack from Meade in pursuit, but none of his army put in an appearance, that is, to fight, until we reached Falling Waters, near the Potomac. On that day Heth's division stopped on the road leading to the Potomac, distant about two and a half miles. We always kept up a line of battle, and on this occasion halted and formed on the left, the west side of the road. In a part of our front was an old breastwork that had been abandoned long ago. Our men had stacked their arms—some were lying on the ground asleep, others were collected in groups, all feeling a sense of security, as no enemy had ventured in sight since we had left Hagerstown.

On a small eminence on the front of our line Generals Heth and Pettigrew and several other officers, including myself, were looking back over the route we had traveled, when we noticed a small body of cavalry emerge from a strip of woods, distance about two hundred and fifty yards. After reaching the open space they halted and the officer in command rode to the front as if to address the men. We observed them closely, and our group concluded they were confederates. We saw them unfurl a United States flag, but we thought it was a capture that our friends were to carry to us and make some ado over it. Presently they started toward us at a tolerably rapid pace, and when they got within fifty yards of us they advanced at a gallop with drawn sabers, shouting: "Surrender! surrender!" General Heth exclaimed: "It's the enemy's cavalry?" When opposite, they rushed over our little group, using their sabers and firing their pistols, mortally wounding Gen. Pettigrew, and dashed among the infantry, eighteen hundred strong, shouting at the top of their voices: "Surrender! surrender!"

At first the confusion was great. Our officers calling upon their men to form and use the bayonet, at the same time dodging the saber cuts and using their pistols with great effect. Lieut. Baker killed two and Capt. Norris three men. As soon as our men took in the situation, and after they had reached their guns these daring fellows were quickly dispatched. In the height of the confusion their officer galloped in our midst, and in less time than it takes to relate the circumstance he was riddled with bullets. He was a gallant looking fellow, riding a magnificent dark-colored horse, but he and his men were to a man either killed or wounded in this quick and rash undertaking. There was not more than 125 of them, but I will venture to say they came nearer stampeding or capturing a division than they ever did before. Their horses were nearly all killed or so badly crippled as to make them useless. Only two or three were brought off the field, though they were all captured.

I talked with one of the survivors of the regiment to which the squadron belonged, and he told me their officer was promoted only the day before for gallant and meritorious service. My recollection is that it was part of the Sixth Michigan cavalry. There was a large body of cavalry a few miles behind this squadron, and we remained at Falling Water about one hour skirmishing with these. We finally fell back through the woods in line of battle to the river, crossing it with the loss of some stragglers and parts of companies that were detached and lost their way in the woods.

"De ole man Saunders an' his wife war' over to see me las' nite," said Brother Gardner, as a hush fell upon the multitude. "I reckon dey didn't feel 'zactly easy in deir minds. Somebody in de church had bin tellin' 'em dat it was an awful sin to dance. When dey axed my advice on de subjeck I answered 'em same as I have answered all others. A religun which won't let a man walk frew a quadrille to de sound of musick am weak somewhar'. A religun which rolls off a pusson's shoulders de minit he begins to laugh or sing or kick up his heels won't take him to de sort of Heaben I want to go to.

"An' when de ole man axed me if playin' keerds was gwine to consign his soul to perdishun I had de same answer dat I gave you las' y'ar. I wouldn't advise any of you to take a pack of keerds in your coat-tail pocket an' sot out to win all de beer you could drink, an' I wouldn't advise a lady to call do hostler in from de ba'n to try an' beat him out of his month's wages; but when I am told dat religun forbids me to sot down in my own house and play a game of euchre wid my old woman or a naybur, I mus' look upon it as a sort of lower deck ideah.

"When de ole man axed me if I thought he could go to de theater an' squeeze into Heaben too, I had de same answer I shall allus have. A Christian who can't sot frew a play widout feelin' Satan tuggan' at his coat-tails had better lock hisself up in a bank vault an' forgit de combinashun. I take de ole woman an' sail down to de theater 'bout twice a month, an' I can't reckolect that our guilty consciences have kept us awake or made us ashamed to walk into church nex' Sunday.

"I want a religun, my friends, dat kin stan' temptashun. I want one dat kin meet Satan at de doah of a circus an' knock him colder dan a wedge. I want one dat will let me play euchre an' yet keep me from cheatin'. I want one dat will go wid me to de theater an' enjoy what am good an' condemn what am bad. I want a religun widout any dyspepsia or liber complaint in it. If it am de sort of a religun dat a dance am gwine to peel off I want to know it in time to look fur a kind dat will stick by me frew thick an' thin. A pusson who am afeard dat de minit he begins to smile his religun will begin to crack like new varnish must be in an uncomfortable state o' mind. Let me tempted. If my religun am strong nuff to resist I shall have the glory of victory. If it am not let me ax fur forgiveness an' tighten up de bolts an' try again. Be good. Respect de church. Reverence true Christianity an' try an' foller de teachin's of de good book, but be keerful how you clothe yerselves in armor dat will be shivered by de sounds of a fiddle an' fall to de ground at de sight of a circus purceshun. Let us now assault de reg'lar order of bizness."
