To Prevent Hands Tanning and Freckling

Undoubtedly warm weather brings strong temptation to go barehanded and the girl who does will not have white hands. For the skin will freckle, if it does not brown, and either will make it course. Gloves must be worn. One might as well accept this, however uncomfortable covering the hands may be, if the flesh is to be kept fine.

In point of fact, gloves are not half as uncomfortable as many girls fancy. To begin with, all gloves worn in summer should be at least half a size larger than those for winter. This additional space permits circulation of air, so the fingers do not become warm. Of the kinds of gloves, chamois are more than protective; they are refining to the skin, softening and whitening it. As they wash easily, simply by squeezing them in soapy water and rinsing afterwards, they are not to be considered extravagant, and I advocate their use. I know one girl who is much out of doors, yet whose hands are white and fine, and she wears chamois all winter, and when she knows she will not remove her gloves before returning home she puts on a certain pair which she always wears when she has previously treated her hands with cream. This treatment consists of rubbing the backs of her hands and the fingers lightly with sweet almond oil, then dusting them thickly with powdered chalk. After that the gloves are drawn on. The chalk prevents the grease from going through the leather, and the skin is under treatment all the time the gloves are on. Such a method should be followed always by a girl who plays tennis, or is out of doors much in warm weather.

If gloves seem to interfere with holding golf sticks or tennis bats cut off the finger tips, then the fingers will be free while the skin is protected. Gloves once cut do not wear as long as when whole, but those worn for recreation may be taken from the stock which is too old to wear when visiting or shopping.

If the backs of the hands burn or tan easily a mixture of lemon and sweet almond oil will act as a bleach. Lemon juice and powdered magnesia should be mixed into a thick mass, then enough almond oil must be added to reduce it to a paste. A drop of bitter almond oil to a tablespoonful of the paste improves its bleaching qualities. This mixture must be spread over the skin before gloves are drawn on, and may be used during the day or at night. MARGARET MIXTER.

Hail the Rainmakers.

South Dakota and northern Nebraska have had a taste of the never failing rainmakers from Omaha. In the good old days, when long-haired professors were squinting at the skies through bootlegs and pointing stovepipes aimlessly at the heavens, that refused to weep at the sights that made men laugh, the Omaha rainmaker came into prominence and popularity.

He's a good chap to know, too; take the general manager or president of a big jobbing house, surround him by general executive officers of other big jobbing houses, manufactories, and similar enterprises; dress each in holiday garb, and give him a bundle of neatly printed pamphlets, extolling Omaha. Set these down at any railroad station within a million miles of Omaha, with a band at their head, and a magnificent train behind them.

The result is rain. It's a mathematical certainty, just as capable of demonstration as that 2 and 2 make 4.

But the rainmaker doesn't mind it. He knows that rain is good for the farmer's business, and that makes business for Omaha.

Omaha is proud of the rainmakers, and is glad to see them go abroad each season, knowing that in their footsteps spring up bountiful crops, and in the smile of plenty the land waxes fat where they have called.

Hail the rainmakers!

Disappointed.

One of the sad things about the comet's passage was that a lot of folks were disappointed when they woke up on Thursday morning, and found they had to go back to work at the same old job. They'll feel better tomorrow, when the ghost walks. Pay day makes up for a lot of things in this world.

Real Comet Dope.

Our pet little comet chaser says the astronomical sharps are all off; that they missed the signal.

Old Man Hailey signalled for an outcurve, when the skygazing crew were looking for an inshoot, and that's all there is to it.

We told you so last week.

Buzz Gently.

Here's a friendly tip to some of the snort wagon enthusiasts who look on Farnam street as a sort of velodrome:

Everybody likes to see you go whizzing down the street, but a lot of foolish people have contracted the habit of wanting to use the street for ordinary commercial and social purposes at times. So it's up to the daring drivers to slow down a trifle when going through town; try to make a noise like the Overland Limited going through Schuyler; don't hit it up over thirty-five miles an hour when you cross Sixteenth street, and you'll be about right.

We love our speed merchants, but, oh, you pedestrian.

Not the Comet.

WASHINGTON, May 20.—(Special Telegram.) — That bright light noted in the eastern sky on Wednesday was not the glare of Hailey's comet as it swung towards the earth. It was merely the
