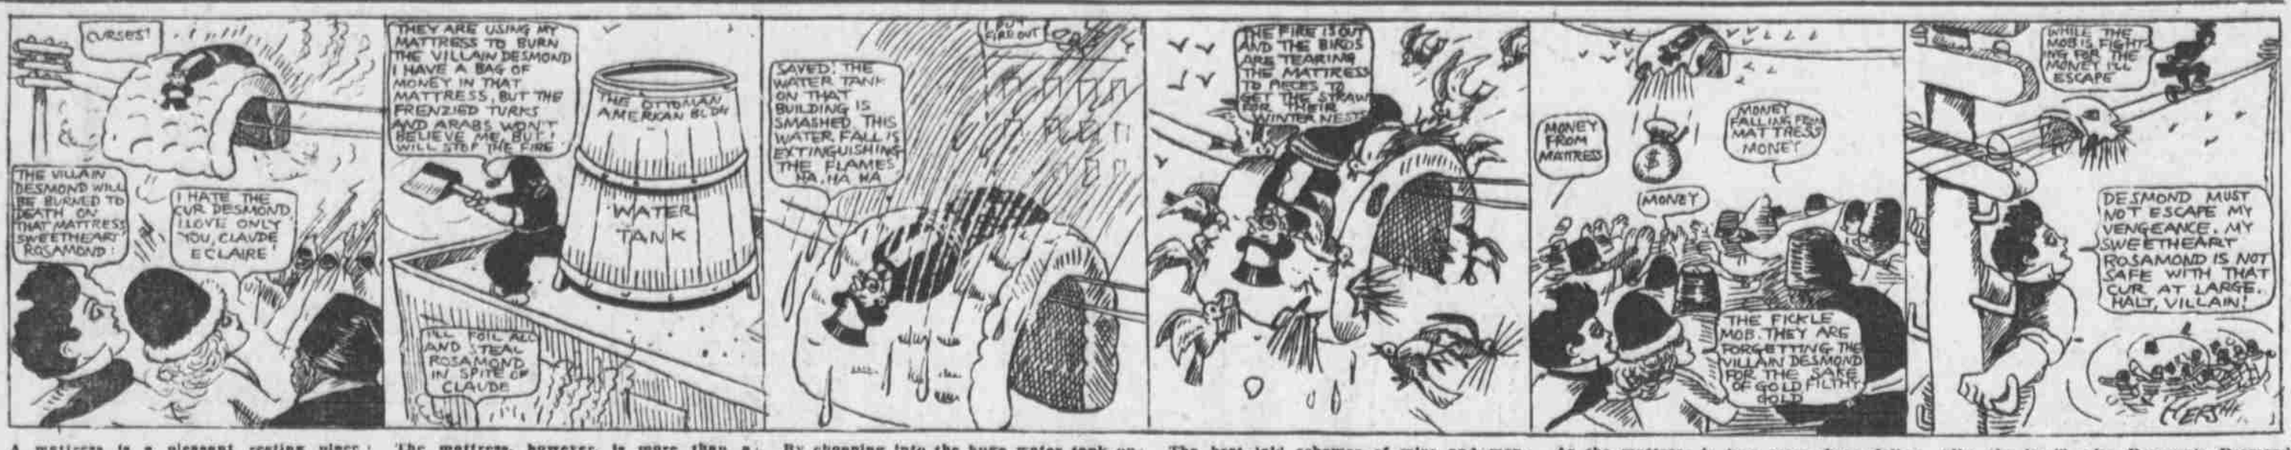
Desperate Desmond

After a Thrilling Escape from His Funeral Pyre, the Villain Does a Wire-Walking Stunt

By Hershfield

Copyright, 1911, National News Association.



A mattress is a pleasant resting place when one is about to have a good night's sleep, but when the mattress is hung over a telegraph wire, and, furthermore, is burning rapidly there is not so much fun in it. Desmond, indeed, finds it about the most uncomfortable place he has struck in the course of a somewhat varied career.

The mattress, however, is more than a mere mattress to the Turk, from whose house it was taken. It is his bank. In it he had hidden his gold, to protect it from the extortions of the avaricious Turkish officials. And now the unfortunate man is frantically endeavoring to put out the fire in some way and to prevent the Turks from learning of the money he has concealed.

By chopping into the huge water tank on the skyscraper roof the Turk has succeeded in sending a heavy shower over the blazing mattress. This saves Desmond from being cooked like a lark on a spit, but the Turk cares little for that. He knows now that the mob will not get next to his private banking establishment, and he already feels the gold in his possession.

The best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft agley, says Burns, who could seldom refrain from ringing some Scotch dialect into his verses. Otherwise his poems are not so bad. So in this case we see the Turk's plan ganging agley because of some birds that tear straw out of the mattress to make their warm nests. Straw mattresses are out of date, anyway.

As the mattress is torn open, down falls the gold the Turk had hoarded. "Cursed thirst for gold!" as some other poet has remarked—it makes the mob forget all about Desmond's crimes, and the people's one cry is, "Loot!" Needless to say, Desmond knows the power of the just for gold and knows that he can get away unmolested.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "and I'm travelling like a telegram!" He is skiddooing on the wires, but Claude Eclaire, spurning the chance of getting loot, is climbing up the telegraph pole, determined to follow the villain, if need be, to the ends of the earth. Rosamond must be protected. For details of the chase, see tomorrow's paper.
