TUBERCULOSIS AMONG CATTLE

How to Prevent Spread of Dreadful Scourge.

NO CERTAIN CURE FOR DISEASE

By L. B. Stardevant, M. D., Department of Veterinary Science, University of Nebraska.

This is a disease which materially affects stock raising in all parts of the world. No climate or locality is exempt. All ages and breeds are attacked. It is also by far the most dreadful scourge with which the human race has to do. Among domestic animals, cattle take the disease most easily, while hogs are second in this regard. Horses are not often attacked. Even chickens are subject to the disease.

In former years tuberculosis was most commonly found in cattle of city dairies and in pure breeds.

Although the varieties of the disease in man and in the ox have certain important differences, it is known that the human variety of tuberculosis may attack the ox and vice versa.

After killing an animal badly affected with the disease and examining the internal organs, one may see white or yellowish spots or lunules called "tubercles," which are not natural and which are the centers of the disease. The organs most often affected are the lungs and the bowels.

The cause of tuberculosis is a very tiny form of vegetable life, called the germ or bacillus of tuberculosis. This is so small that the strongest powers of the microscope are required to see it, and thousands and even millions of them are present in the diseased animal. The bacillus of tuberculosis was discovered in 1882 by Dr. Koch, a famous German scientist.

The most important conditions which favor the disease are a lack of fresh air and sunshine, such as comes with close confinement in poorly ventilated and poorly lighted stables, and in close association with tuberculous animals.

The disease germs enter the lungs with the air usually in the form of dust from manure coming from a tuberculous animal, or by way of the bowels with the food. The manure from cattle having tuberculosis is thus the most dangerous means of spreading the disease.

The milk of a tuberculous cow may contain germs of the disease, especially if the udder itself is affected. Such milk is unfit for use. Healthy milk is also unfit for use if tuberculous manure gets into it.

Unfortunately, a tuberculous animal, as a rule, shows no symptoms by which the disease can be detected, even in the last stages of the disease. The only reliable way of detecting the disease is the tuberculin test. Any good veterinarian can apply this test. In this test a small dose of tuberculin is injected under the skin of the animal to be tested. If the animal has tuberculosis it will have a fever on the day after injection. If it is healthy the temperature on the day after injection will be about the same as on the day before, as shown by the veterinarian's thermometer.

There is no certain cure for tuberculosis in cattle.

The cattle which are shown to have tuberculosis by the tuberculin test are called tuberculin "reactors." The reactors must be removed from the herd at once in order to keep the disease from spreading. They may be sold to the packing houses to be slaughtered and then examined by the meat inspectors in the employ of the United States government. If it is desired to save tuberculous cows for a few years in order that these may produce calves, such cows must be kept quarantined, that is to say, in a separate yard, where there will be no chance for manure from them to be carried into the yard or pasture where the healthy cattle are kept, either by the wind or on the shoes of the men who take care of them.

Calves born from tuberculous cows should be taken from their mothers shortly after birth and be placed with healthy cows before they have a chance to catch the disease.

GROWING CROPS IN WESTERN NEBRASKA

The Nebraska Experiment Station has just issued bulletin No. 118 on "Growing Crops in Western Nebraska." This bulletin gives the results of crop production at the North Platte Substation during the past seven years, together with the record of precipitation at North Platte for the past 36 years, and a discussion of methods of farming for dry land.

Considerable space is given to showing the results secured by summer tilling land. The yield of winter wheat has been doubled by this method of preparing the seed bed. The average yield of plats properly prepared and seeded has been 46 bushels per acre during the past five years. The yield from these plats in 1910, when the precipitation for the year was only 10.7 inches, was 35 to 37 bushels per acre. Summer tilling sod and old land for winter wheat is strongly advocated. The records show that summer tilling also increased the yields of spring grains, but not to so great an extent.
