

Comment. - - and Discomment

We hasten to disclaim any relationship with Miss Jane Burr, who seems to be stirring up a fearful rumpus in London due to certain "advanced" ideas she entertains on the subject of feminine independence. We will confess that her ideas are appealing, in a certain sense, but they wouldn't do for Nebraska. It is probably true that Jane might not be anxious to claim kinship with us, but that's another question.

The mere mention of feminine independence and Jane in the same breath might lead one to believe that she is a militant suffragette. Thank heaven, she's a bug of another color. Jane writes for a living, and therefore it is altogether possible that she does not practice what she preaches, any more than the young lady who conducts the cooking recipe column, or the old maid who gives complete directions on rearing children. Jane's hobby is the emancipation of women, not from corsets or high heels, but from the tyranny of man the chief man-made institution, marriage.

Jane, along with Fanny Hurst, whose marriage got considerable publicity a few months ago, is advocating the adoption by Britain of the feminist apartment house. "All women are sick to death of marriage," says Jane. "Revolt is spreading. I am only one among many who carries the deadly germ among her sisters, and I succeed in inoculating at least three hundred women every year." On the theory that while women may want a home and husband, "they want a husband when they want him, and they want a home of their own making," Jane argues for the feminist style apartment house, which is described as follows:

"These apartments consist of living room, bedroom and bathroom," explains Miss Burr. "No husband is permitted to live with his wife and no wife with her husband. They may have apartments side by side, but their happiness is to be safeguarded by fireproof walls and locks. There will be a nursery on the roof with professional mothers in charge."

Of course, Jane is meeting with resistance, which was to be expected of London, and was probably just what she was hoping to find. One stalwart defender of the faith writes: "Where does love come in in Miss Burr's scheme of things? Who delegated to her the authority to state that all women are sick to death of marriage. And whoever heard of love wanting to be safeguarded by fireproof walls and locks?" And another writer, a woman, cattishly calls attention to the fact that Miss Burr didn't have sense enough to accept a good man when she had the chance. It seems that Jane had bragged of turning down two men because their ideas didn't coincide with hers.

If ever we find ourselves unable to make a living pounding out copy for a newspaper, we shall go into the business of being a psychologist, and will organize a movement among men to do away with something that has hitherto been regarded as indispensable. It ought to be easy to write such rot as Jane gets away with. If just a trifle daring, with a trace of sex interest in it, we ought to get by. Here's some more of Jane's stuff (and there's no particular harm in reading it):

"All women are sick to death of marriage. Our mothers are sick of it and their mothers were before them, but the lie has to be kept up, the illusion maintained, for the safety of the coming generation. But is it safety to push our young girls and boys off into something that we know beforehand has made us wretched? Of course it isn't safety. It is disaster of the blackest variety."

"The program laid down for the future woman will take gallantry and health to carry out. To begin with, we've got to quit working the men on that threadbare business of being the mother of their children. We've got to be trained to jobs, and we've got to learn how to be cast aside. Even the newest of new women jilts a dozen men, but howls to heaven if one deserts her. But this is because she is still suffering under the delusion that her market value has decreased. It has not decreased unless she is a dependent woman."

"The modern woman feels herself pulled both ways. She reaches forward for freedom and at the same time turns her eyes back longingly towards home and babies and what she thinks a husband ought to be. There should be no more girls born for a hundred years. But what are we working women to do with our babies after we have them? We are going to turn them over to professional mothers."

FAMOUS BARITONE, FAVORITE IN MANY ROLES

Glen Ellison, who appears in a concert next Friday at the Imperial, has sung all kinds of roles in the operatic world, for which he is so justly famous.

In England and Australia he appeared in a variety of offerings ranging all the way from Grand Opera to musical comedy. Americans know him especially for his sympathetic interpretation of well known songs. His clear baritone is admirably suited to these real melodies, and there is a true Scotch burr on his tongue which makes his rendition of those wonderful old tunes carry you straight back to the purple heather. Few artists in the musical world can put into these Scotch songs the deep sympathy and fine feeling that Mr. Ellison gives them.

Mr. Ellison holds to the theory that "We should continually strive for the best in life and for the betterment of our fellowmen." Surely it is this theory that has made Glen Ellison one of the best loved singers in the world, for his songs seem always to carry a message of cheer and happiness.

Friday's concert promises to be one of the best of the season, for the famous baritone is feeling very fit owing to his strenuous athletic existence—for Glen Ellison is an enthusiastic huntsman, fisherman and horseman.
