Hay Springs Aroused Over Discovery of a Deep Sea Monster

Alkali Lake, 17 1/2 miles southeast of Hay Springs, is now said to be the home of an octopus of something that has the appearance of one, says the Hay Springs News. It has been seen three or four different times and is described in various forms. One party imagined the length to be about eight feet, while another says he saw at least six feet of this monster of the deep above water and goodness knows how many feet was under water. Another said, "It's head was all I saw and it was as big as a wash tub." The lake is about a half mile from shore to shore and it keeps pretty well to the center. As the reports come in, sight-seers go out, but as yet only a few who did not happen to have a spy glass have caught sight of it.

This lake has been quite a source of speculation. First it was only considered valuable as a place to harvest ice and for many years our ice houses have been packed with beautiful glittering cakes obtained from its surface. Two years ago, it was discovered that potash salts were there in paying quantities if only it could be secured, but it needed capital and all the capital in the world had been invested at Antioch, and so this lake was left without development. Last spring one of our fellowtownsmen saw a fish come to the surface. He rushed back to town, baited a hook and swung it out. He caught a fish and then another, and another, until the string of fish was more than a foot long. Others flocked to the lake, some however returning with the usual fisherman's luck. But perseverance demonstrated the fact that the whole lake was literally alive with fish. And now comes this octopus or something. Who knows but what there is a family of them, which may account for the different descriptions and size of the object as viewed at different times by different people. As Bill Newton would say, "By Golly, it might be a mermaid!"
