However, that section is in no need of immediate rains. A carefully prepared statement from all points along the entire system of the Burlington in Nebraska shows a good state of affairs. Small grain is not doing well. This is not attributed to the hot winds of the past few days, but to the fact that little moisture was in the ground from which to draw early in the spring season. Realizing this the acreage of small grain was much reduced, while corn, which would depend more upon the rains of the present season, was more largely planted. Corn along the Burlington lines is 80 per cent of the whole cereal crop. The hot winds have in no wise hurt corn. This system covers the state, and this estimate will apply to all parts of Nebraska. The crop could not
