and Pacific coasts, and it is inconceivable that any American states. man will vote to permit the relegation of the control of our isthmustransit to any European power, remanding the United States navy and American commerce to the Cape Horn route, at the option of the parties controlling the canal. President Hayes called the canal "a continuation of our coast line." It is more than that; it is a dominant factor in the control of the commerce of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and Lake Nicaragua is a position unique in its importance to our national interests. Gibraltar, Aden, or the Bosphorous do not compare with it in the value of its military position. Upon its bosom an iron-clad fleet may float in fresh water, in a delightful climate, surrounded by a territory producing supplies for fleets and armies. The construction of the canal will be a practical, friendly, and complete vindication of the Monroe doctrine, assuring our friendly and paramount influence with our sister-republics of North and South America.

The Pacific states appeal to the patriotic impulses of all Americans. By journeys over trackless plains or around the Cape our pioneers paved the way for us and laid the foundation of our Pacific empire. The time has come when our eastern fellow-countrymen can aid us, and in so doing, honor and benefit our whole country and the commercial world. The political consideration of the canal can have only one result with patriotic, intelligent Americans. It must convince them of the necessity of an inter-oceanic canal under American control. It would be unfortunate beyond comprehension if the day should come when the great canal, under the control of a rival maritime power, should become a menace to our interests instead of a peaceful highway for the world's commerce, and a monument to American statesmanship and to American energy.-Capt. W. I. Merry, in the February Forum.
