BENTON AND FOOTE.

A Famous Scene in the Senate as a Man Now Living Saw It.

Wagoner in National Republican. I read in your paper of a few days ago an article from Meriville's Weekly, giving a statement furnished by Col. Jacob Thompson of a scene that occurred between Senators Benton and Foote, correcting as he claimed, the report of the same in The Century. I desire to correct the correction.

It may be as well to state here that there had been a great deal of ill feeling existing between these senators for a considerable time, generated to an acrimonious political debate. In this Foote was the most erring, for he had a greater gift of invective than any man I have ever known.

When Foote began his speech I think there was a general excitement as to what might be the result. None of us had to wait long before Foote began with a splendidly rhetorical flourish of denunciation, which, when he had filled it up high enough, was to point out the party referred to by toppling over and over, and over again, crushing him.

At this time, however, Foote had no pistol as Benton doubtless could see, and his action was merely dramatic parade. In retreating from Benton, Foote left a place where, if he had desired to defend himself, or use his pistol, he had nothing to do but to turn slightly to the left, toward the wall, and without endangering any one.

It is a pity that the man who was so ready to fight more—and I think he was really game. But none of us are always the same, and he had every reason to believe that Benton meant war.

It makes a Difference. The other day a tramp found a real female philanthropist in Detroit. She felt sorry for him, and fed him and gave him a job.

Our Only Hope. Professor Faigz says that, unless another ark is built, a global flood will in four years depopulate the world. Well, then, for mercy's sake don't let us build it.

Parallel Pictures. "Ceil wall, with a picture of a step, back and forth the length of the fire-iron rack; her shadow, mounting the low walls to the ceiling, followed her with grotesque exaggerations of her movements."

When I spoke, did not recall any parallel case, nor could he advise me what steps were proper in the case. I solved the difficulty by taking proceedings by petition in the supreme court. The matter was referred for proof of the facts alleged in the petition. We proved that the missing son had not been heard from for fourteen years, and that all efforts to find him had proved futile.

When I was dead my spirit turned to seek the man I loved; I passed the door and saw my friends Feasting beneath green orange boughs. From hand to hand they pushed the wine. The lack of light illumined our faces; They sang, they jested and they laughed, For such was loved by each.
