Scene of Wolfe's Victory. The one place of supreme interest to all Englishmen is the historic plateau known as the Heights of Abraham, just beyond the citadel, where, as Pitt felicitously expressed it, "Wolfe, with a handful of men, added an empire to English rule." Few great battles appeal more to the imagination than this, won by a general at an age when most of our soldiers considered themselves fortunate if they have obtained their company; and conducted, too, with sublime daring in defiance of all recognized rules of warfare. Every one knows the moving story of the battle. Indeed, one might almost say that the immortal lines of Gray have earned greater fame through the oft-told incident of Wolfe, with a strange foreboding of his fate, quoting them to his officers when drifting down the St. Lawrence to engage in the desperate adventure which must infallibly make him or break him, for there could be no middle course between an overwhelming victory or crushing defeat. opening the doors of medical colleges | Luck was on the daring general's side, as we all know. His advance guard, creeping up the precipitous path from

"De la reine," answered the officer, who fortunately remembered that this regiment was at Montreal with Bougainville. Wolfe's advance guard was within the lines of Montcalm's out-

Recalls Last Phase of Waterloo When morning dawned, Montcalm, who had ridden hurriedly from Quebec, found himself confronted by the thin red line of Wolfe's little army of 4,000 men drawn up in battle array. The actual battle-the shortest on record in modern times-lasted barely fifteen minutes, and might be told, aptly remarks the author of "Deeds That Won the Empire," in as many minutes. The plan of the battle curiously recalls the last phase of Waterloo. The French advanced unchecked till within forty paces of the English lines, when they were thrown into confusion by a welltimed volley from the whole line. Then Wolfe ordered a general advance, and the British charged with the wildest anthusiasm, with Wolfe himself at the nead of his grenadiers. Wounded three times, the dying general was taken to the rear. "See how they run," says one of his staff. "Who run?"

How He Succeeded. "If I hadn' acted upon the advice of a friend I am afraid that I should have not have been married today, at least to my present wife," laughed the genial traveler. "When I courted the lady she was of a romantic disposition, the result of reading a class of novels that pass for literature among some people. I think at that time she had an idea that some day a prince with nodding plumes would come riding out of the East and carry her away for his bride. At any rate, whenever I proposed, which was about as often as I met her. I got beautifully turned down. I was getting discouraged when an old friend of mine, who understood the situation, said to me: 'My boy, Jennie is a good girl, but her head is in the clouds the greater part of the time. Now, what you want to do is to catch her when she is down on the earth with the rest of us. Let me give you a pointer. Every Monday morning she is obliged to take care of the large family baking, and right there is your opportunity to find her with her feet firmly planted upon the earth. Call around there when she is over the top of the oven and state your case.' I took the hint and called early one Monday morning. I found her in a calico dress, with her hair done up in curl papers, and her arms busily manipulating a rolling pin, and there, seated on a kitchen chair, without one romantic feature about it, she promised to be mine. She told me afterwards that at the time she didn't know which way was east, letting alone conjuring up a prince,"-Detroit Free Press.
