The poet sat in his den.
With his leg crossed over his knee.
Writing away—day after day—
And his mind from trouble was free.

He hadn't written long, his brain was racked For a line that was just the rhyme. He took up his pen, went to writing again, When he saw it was covered with slime. In horror he dashed the pen to the ground— And his paper he tore into bits. He gobbled up his ink—what do you think: It was labeled "Milwaukee Schlitz."

For a short while the poet in agony groaned Tortures worse than death racked his soul The feelings that fell upon our John L. Can be better imagined than told. The bottle now sleeps in Platte river bed,
And the pen is likewise at rest.
The poet still lives, only prose items to give
And the people say it is the best.
