Price, says in part: "When I announced myself as a candidate for the office of United States senator I was not actuated by the thought that my party or the people owed me anything for the services given either the state or nation. I merely exercised the right which every citizen has under the law to submit my name for approval or rejection and to satisfy an ambition which I have enteretained to represent the people of this state. I also feel that in a small way I had especially contributed to the political conditions now existing in our state that might bring to my candidacy a sufficient following to make my ambition reasonably certain of success and in this hope I have had many assurances from all parts of the state.

"There are, however, many of my friends who believe that another might be selected that has greater elements of strength than I have and who may have contributed more large ly to the success of the cause which is so dear to myself and others. Therefore I am deferring to their wishes and hereby announce my withdrawal. I do this with little reluctance, as conditions now present themselves. Now, as ever, I long for the success of the things for which I have contended before the people in this state and under no circumstances could I or would I permit my personal ambition to rican Methodist church; Henry Clark, stand in the way.
