ROMANCE OF THE STEAMBOAT DAYS ON OLD MISSOURI

Story of Buried Treasure Near Nebraska City Still Attracts the Interest of the Public.

Is there still a treasure of many thousands of dollars securely buried near Nebraska City in the Missouri river bottoms?

A grim and grizzled veteran of the river service came here August 11th, 1884, to be exact—more than forty years ago—not like Lochinvar, to be sure, but to treat one more measure with his "Lost Love," but to unearth a treasure that he said was buried years ago. At that time a reporter of The News interviewed him.

The old man said that ten years before the famous lower-river steamer Crystal Palace was launched, the efforts made on the steamer Crescent City, of New Orleans, on its last trip. That was in 1842. The cargo of the vessel was a secret to her crew—and also her destination.

He did know, however, that her lockers were stored with the richest of the west, and that she was passing St. Louis without stopping her paddles turning into the turbid Missouri and taking on coal at St. Charles, she stopped for wood forty miles below the present site of Kansas City.

While the wood was being stowed away, two of the cabin passengers boarded the boat and went in tow behind and slipped away in the darkness. The next day it was discovered that the boat's safe had been opened and several packages of gold and silver coin abstracted. The robbery first revealed to the mate the real character of the cargo and the object of the men who had chartered the Crescent City for a three-months' trip.

Her load of sealed packages was the result of a successful piece of piracy on the Gulf and most valuable character of which $90,000 was in coin.

The boat was to take the haul to some point on the upper Missouri and conceal it until it could be safely taken back to the Father of Waters. The efforts to locate the two pirates who had taken French leave of their comrades were barren of results and the steamer continued her course up stream. After reaching a point beyond Omaha, the Crescent City encountered a snag, penetrating her hull and causing her to sink.

The weight of the water rushing into the hull righted her in fifteen minutes, but the exposed flues of her boilers had become red hot and the water rushing back upon them again caused an explosion that destroyed the boiler. The old man said that one of the few to escape unhurt. He carried off what was left of the treasure on a hastily improvised raft.

The mate, captain, steward and one deck hand were all that remained of the original crew. These men carried the treasure out of the Crescent City's planks, loaded the bags of specie and started down the river.

At a point near Nebraska City at the head of the slough, the scow got into a swirl, tipped and threw the travelers into the black waters. The old mate held to the boat and saved himself. He never saw the others again. The coin, however, did not budge an inch from the bottom of the tub until he teared her into a cove and threw them on the bank.

"I stayed there all night," said the old man, telling his own story. "The mate hid the gold in a cove and I hid the rest in a hole in the bank. The coin, however, did not budge an inch from the bottom of the tub until he teared her into a cove and threw them on the bank."
