An Oxford undergraduate now in this country thinks American college students have too little privacy for study. At Oxford, he says, a student has a lock on his door and may study night and day if he wants to. Well, so far as we know, there is nothing to prevent an American student from having a lock put on his door and studying day and night—if he wants to.

The people of the South are not satisfied with the appointment of Thomas Woodlock of New York for the interstate commerce commission. The South once more has been refused membership on this important government body, which fixes the railroad rates in the country. The appointment came as a distinct disappointment to the southern members of the house and senate.

A most dilapidated, rattletrap wreck of a Ford, without a bit of paint in evidence anywhere, went through Plattsmouth the other day. It bore the following placard: "You needn't laugh, girls; if you had all the paint rubbed off, you'd look like h—, too."
 Life in Washington has been subscribed recently as being "just one cocktail after another." That should be a great improvement over its former state, which was just one investigation after another. But those who live there say the improvement really is negligible.

The cost of crime in the United States is estimated at 10 billion dollars a year. That's only a little more than $90 for every man, woman and child in the country. It is less than one-half the national debt. America should not be parsimonious. The country can afford to spend more on crime and criminals.

GOVERNMENT BY FACTIONS

What has reduced Williamson county to this condition? The rioting has occurred in connection with strikes, in connection with bootlegging, in connection with the Klan. Yet none of these things can be the ultimate cause. Strikes, bootlegging and the Klan are not confined to Williamson county. Nor is it of any importance to determine which gangster fired the first shot. The lawlessness of Williamson county is deeper than any of this.

The searcher for causes soon becomes aware that in Williamson county the force of the community is not concentrated in the government but scattered among private factions. Apparently in Williamson county a man who has wanted protection or has wished to see a statute enforced could not appeal to public authority. He had to align himself with some armed faction. He had to seek protection of the laws outside the laws, the benefits of government outside the government. He might line up with the miners, he might become a Knight of the Ku Klux Klan or a Knight of the Flaming Circle. He did not line up with the legally constituted power of the community.

He feared the other faction more than he feared the authorities, he trusted his own desperadoes more than he trusted the authorities. In the state of civil war, as in other war, it might be dangerous to join one of the armies, but it was a great deal safer to join them than to be a neutral in No Man's Land. That is the state of mind which produces a Herrin.

But what produces the state of mind? Williamson county has all the ordinary machinery of government. The machinery does not work. It has broken down because of a failure to solve two, at least, of the great problems of the day of conflict between capital and labor and the conflict between imposed righteousness and personal liberty. Williamson county is really a symptom of what can happen when government is strained until it cracks. Places upon it a task too great for the powers of the men who administer the government—in this case the task, first, of harmonizing aggregated capital and aggregated labor unions; second, of imposing prohibitions which run counter to the habits of the community—add a frontier tradition of gun-toting, and government disintegrates. It cannot do its work. And out of that ruin rises self-selected private organizations to do, each in its own way, what government has failed to do.—New York World.

WHEN LINCOLN ATE BEANS

When Abraham Lincoln was nominated for president, in 1860, the East went wild with fear that the uncouth wild westerner of the Illinois prairies might shock the sensibilities of polite Washington, if elected. After he entered the White House this fear continued to corrugate the surface of the East. Stories were circulated to the effect that the thing called "etiquette" was not in the Lincoln vocabulary. It was announced, and more or less widely believed, that the new president was a "sword swallower"—that he shoved food into his mouth with his caseknife.

For nearly 50 years, Mr. Edward P. Mitchell wrote editorials for the old and honorable New York Sun, and for more than 22 years he was editor in chief. He was, moreover, a born reporter. His powers of observation are illustrated by an excerpt from "Memoirs of An Editor," a new book of Mitchell's autobiography. Mr. Mitchell relates that when he was only 10 years of age his uncle took him to Washington to see President Lincoln. A doorman let them into the wrong room.
 "It was a small room. At a small table in the middle of it sat Mr. Lincoln, all alone, facing us and eating his breakfast. At the opening of the door he raised his eyes and gazed at the unexpected visitors. The large hand holding the fork that carried what both Uncle Henry and I remembered as a considerable cargo of Boston baked beans remained suspended for several seconds midway between the plate and the half-open mouth which the fork was in transit."
 Thus perishes another aspersion. Of course, President Lincoln was violating the unwritten law of New England by eating Boston baked beans for breakfast instead of keeping them for the Saturday night supper; but the wild west will be glad to know, even at this late day, that he didn't eat pie for breakfast.
