HUMAN STUPIDITY

Canon Woods, of Cambridge, England, made a speech to 1,000 clergymen. It is to be hoped that most of these clergymen were intelligent because they listened to a splendid speech and had a chance to profit by it, and pass along, each in his own sphere, the results of his ruminations.

To all who are capable of thinking, Canon Woods' remarks present material for many an hour of thought. Here are a few extracts from his speech:

"It is disquieting to observe how much there is in our midst of sheer stupidity and muddle-headedness.

"One generally spots a man of undisciplined mind by his cocksureness, and his cocksureness will be reverse ratio to his years.

"If civilization is the art of living together it must be admitted that the world in general and Europe in particular has not yet made a great success of art.

"It is characteristic of our swift, butting world to want everything at once. There is often virtue in impatience, but the desire for short cuts is frequently stupid and disastrous."

He then summarizes the England of today as follows:

"Politicians who lack the true sense of responsibility, the so-called idle rich who apparently never heard of the word 'discipline,' workmen who repudiate the agreements made in their name by their leaders; dramatists, and film producers who have no sense of reticence or restraint; pleasure seekers who never know when or where to halt; football crowds who boo the referee; holiday makers who defile the countryside with litter; parents who cannot or will not control their children; young people who own no authority but their own wishes and whims."

England is far away from us. About 3,000 miles from our East and about 6,000 miles from our West. The great bulk of our population are so happy and prosperous that they do not care a hang what England thinks or what England is worrying about.

But it might afford every American much food for thought to realize that these remarks of Canon Woods apply as well to us as they do to the English.

One remark, in particular, is striking:

"It is disquieting to observe how much there is in our midst of sheer stupidity and muddle-headedness."

If the speaker had been traveling from New York to San Francisco or from Duluth to New Orleans and had spent a week in each resting place en route, one would suspect that he referred to the religious bigotry of our various sects, the fanaticism of many of our local and national organizations, the underlying intelligence of our political and partisan movements and, in general, the darn-follery of our attitude to the vital and everlasting problems of life.

But, as far as we know, he hasn't been here at all. He was only speaking of England. Yet the shoe seems manufactured for our foot.

Is it possible that we have more in common with England than we knew of? Can the English be the same kind of hopeless ginks that we are?

PROHIBITION JOLTED

Enforcement of prohibition has apparently been handed some hard jolts during recent months. A constant drive to strengthen belief that the law can never be really put in effect has been carried out with the consequent result that many are accepting the assumption as a fact.

Perfect prohibition enforcement will probably not be witnessed by the present generation. At least there are no indications at present that it will. But it is reasonable to expect that conditions will improve over a wider margin of time and that in a decade from now there will be considerably less drinking than is now the case.

Can we say that because we, the present generation, are unable to obey our own laws those who follow us will be likewise deficient. There is a possibility that those who are to come will develop in themselves a higher sense of responsibility to their government. This in itself may not be a purely voluntary change. Economic upheavals may force the people of the future to abide more strictly to the rules which they set upon themselves.

Obviously, prohibition can not be judged pro and con by present results. If a man is sick and, after being given food still remains sick, one does not conclude that food is unnecessary to the man's existence. A search is made for other pills. Similarly, since it has been affirmed by a majority of the people that prohibition is desirable, it should not be eliminated merely because at the moment it does not work out smoothly to the superclaims made for it by its more enthusiastic advocates.

HARD ON BLONDS

"Most blonds are gold diggers.
"Brunettes improve the acquaintance; blonds do not.
"Since there are more brunettes, greater choice can be exercised.
"Brunettes are more discreet."
Such are the conclusions reached by the sophisticated young gentlemen of the College of William and Mary as disclosed by the responses to a questionnaire sent out by an enterprising class in journalism. Three out of every four of the young owned to preference for philandering with blonds but predicted that when the time comes to choose a girl with whom to walk down the church aisle keeping step to Mr. Mendelssohn's well known tune they will give serious and probably favorable consideration to the claims of the brunettes.

Blonds, it seemed to be the consensus of opinion, are "brilliant but irresponsible," brunettes on the other hand are "all there." This exceedingly lucid explanation of the matter makes it as clear as mud.

Just the same the blonds need not be disheartened over the turn affairs have taken. For blonds have been checking in at the marriage altar with pretty gratifying regularity ever since that well known institution was founded and it is highly probable that they will continue to do so, notwithstanding the stand taken by the young gentlemen of William and Mary not a few of whom, we venture to say, will have their coffee poured for them at the breakfast table in future years by blonds.
