POOR GETTING RICHER

Just twenty-five years ago the New York Herald made a careful investigation of the number of rich men in the country. No government statistics were available and in the nature of the case the Herald had to accept local estimates of fortunes. It found 3,828 men who were regarded in their communities as millionaires. These men, according to the estimates gathered by the Herald, owned about one-fifth of the nation's wealth.

There has been an enormous increase in wealth in the last quarter century. But the income tax statistics now published show about eleven thousand millionaires. This is only three times the number estimated in 1901, in spite of the growth of big corporations. If an income of $50,000 a year qualifies a man for the millionaire class, the eleven thousand millionaires, according to the income tax returns for 1924, received 2,275 million dollars in income in that year. This is almost exactly one-tenth of the total net income reported for taxation, which is not the nation's total income.

Apparently the proportion of the nation's wealth controlled by very rich men at the present time is only about one-half as large as it was at the opening of the century. The rich may be getting richer, but evidently the poor are not getting poorer, as used to be said twenty-five years ago. The poor are getting richer.

President Coolidge says the ideal combination is a college education and an artisan's income. We are happy to agree. The college education enlarges the capacity to enjoy things, and the artisan's income provides the wherewith to buy them.
