Has Built a Corduroy.

A. L. Becker has grappled with nature just as she is, and as he had on his hand the materials for the construction of a bridge which would subserve his purpose he used it, and did not go to the markets and purchase concrete and steel girders, but chopped the trees for the stringers, and the poles for the floor and made a corduroy bridge over the creek which meanders through his farm. He has one stout and serviceable, and a bit of history as well, as he has the same bridge which was used for the lands of Indiana, not alone for the streams but also for the swampy land bordering the waterways. However he has solved the bridge problem.
