DRAMATIZING POLITICS

How Mussolini has dramatized politics is shown by the enthusiasm of his followers in New York. After a debate in which he defended Mussolini's policy, Fascists elevated S. S. McClure to their shoulders and carried him triumphantly through the streets of New York. In this country politics is dull and tedious stuff, politics in Italy has the color and interest of a great sporting event. When Mussolini knocks out a political opponent, his followers throughout the world act like a stadium-full of baseball fans as the home team clinches the pennant. In Mussolini's hands, legislation becomes romance, budget bills something to conjure with, orders, manifestoes and proclamations something to read as a little boy reads dime novels.

It is true we experienced something of the sort when Theodore Roosevelt was President. He made public affairs thrilling. Injecting his personality into a controversy which otherwise would have escaped public attention, Roosevelt made a drama of it. Usually he was the hero, it is true; nevertheless, he brought home to the people of the country the vital issues of the day. Wilson, too, explained public issues to the people, and coined striking and illuminating phrases to carry his ideas home.

In this not part of statesmanship, for a President to tell voters what is happening, to tell it graphically, interestingly and even dramatically. Public affairs are far from being prosaic when followed in the light of understanding.

We have a picture, as the saying goes, of Mr. Coolidge demanding Secretary Mellon's resignation because of the latter's admission that he knew of Harry Sinclair's contribution to the Republican party. It is the same picture we had of Mr. Coolidge kicking Daugherty and Denby from the cabinet as soon as their connection with oil scandals became known, only more so. Senator Norris, who makes the suggestion that Mr. Coolidge should demand Secretary Mellon's resignation, is only an old-fashioned moralist, whose views of how men in public office should behave themselves are far behind the times.

If Senator Norris' strict ideas of honesty and scrupulousness were adhered to, Washington would today present the appearance of the deserted village. With Burns getting a colonelcy in the reserve, Forbes being honored with the Distinguished Service Medal while still in prison, and Sinclair and Fall still out of jail, what hope is there that "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton" will have a can tied to him? It would rather seem he is due for a medal, or a promotion or something nice like that.

The long suffering American, who has been plagued by the perplexities of his income blank, recently got a little joy out of the report that the Frenchman was even worse off in this respect. The latter, if he really would not court the chance of trouble with his almighty government, must, it was said, wade through and understand the meaning of some 36 pages of regulations.

Whatever kick the American got out of this news is now, alas, to be dissipated. Somebody has taken the trouble to look up our own regulations in this respect, and has found they cover about 150 pages in all. Instead of being better off than the Frenchman, he is worse off. Instead of running fewer risks of being caught up by the bureaucrats, the American is obliged to run more. Indeed, he has to pay the expenses of a host of bureaucrats whose sole aim is to devise income blanks so intricate that they can set up in business as tax experts, in order to save the citizen from being caught in error by the bureaucrats who are not yet ready to start out on their own bureaucracy is behind any other in pestering the citizen is woefully in error.

There have been ugly rumors in Washington ever since Senator Walsh first pried Teapot Dome open, four years ago. You hear it whispered about that the trail of tainted money "leads so high it will never come out;" amazing hints are dropped, and suspicions.

All of this is not the work of scandal mongers, as you might suppose. It is the fault solely of the oil men who won't tell what happened to that famous collection of Liberty bonds. Just so long as these men frantically try to keep the facts from coming to light, rumors will continue to spread—and, doubtless, to besmirch many innocent persons.

Those who, after looking over the new models at the automobile show, come away perfectly satisfied with the cars they own, could hold a mass meeting in a telephone booth.
