Human nature changes little, if at all, as the centuries roll on, so far as we can see, and we'll bet it wasn't more than a day or two after Moses had come down from Mount Sinai with the newly enacted Ten Commandments before prominent citizens had made up their minds which to obey and which not.

We don't know whether it's sheer intuition or the influence of heredity, but it is a remarkable fact that a girl who has never had on a thing except shoes and stockings from a point three inches above her knees to the floor can put on one of these so-called hostess gowns with a local train to it and manage it perfectly.

When the Jones law was enacted by Congress providing that a sentence of five years in prison and a $10,000 fine may be imposed on persons who violate the prohibition law, the Daily News predicted that the statute, instead of making prohibition more effective, would have the opposite effect by rendering it more difficult to secure convictions.

This view is shared by Courtland Nicoll, one of the foremost lawyers of New York, in an interesting article appearing in the June number of the North American Review.

The Jones law may never be amended or repealed, but it will lapse into inaction through the refusal of juries to find defendants guilty, says Mr. Nicoll.

"The grand juries before which these accused individuals will come for indictment and the petit juries before which they come for trial, are composed of ordinary citizens," he says. "Some buy intoxicants, others drink when they have a chance, others who do neither have among their acquaintances many reputable men and women who do so without being conscious of moral guilt."

"Few juries, I am confident, will deprive a man of his citizenship and place him in jeopardy of a large fine and long prison term, when, judged by the common standards of mankind, he has done nothing wrong or dangerous to another. They realize that the only reason the defendant stands before them is that he failed to distinguish between an individual like themselves and a spy in government employ."

MR. HOOVER'S COMMISSION

President Hoover has, in our opinion, appointed a highly representative National Law Enforcement Commission. Some of the appointees are not national figures, but those that measure up to expectation. Among the latter are the chairman, former Attorney-General Wickersham; Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War under President Wilson; Federal Judge Kenyon and Roscoe Pound, dean of the Harvard Law School. It is fitting that a woman should be on this board, and Miss Ada L. Comstock, president of Radcliffe College, is, we believe, an admirable choice.

It has been observed that all sections of the country are represented in the personnel, which is, of course, as it should be. Far more significant, it seems to us, is the fact that this commission is Mr. Hoover's commission. The dictation of no special interest is discernible. It is neither wet nor dry, in the acceptance of those terms. None of the commissioners, so far as we know, has been conspicuously identified with either side of the prohibition question. That, too, is all to the good.

It may be objected that prohibition is but one item on the commission's agenda, and that to single this law out as the paramount object of the inquiry is to misapprehend the purpose and spirit of the survey. We are aware of the scope of the commission's charter, so to speak, as outlined in the President's address to the Associated Press; but the fact remains, nevertheless, that prohibition is the paramount issue; that, except for that law and its systematic violation, it may be doubted if such an effort had been launched by presidential initiative. Everybody knows that when the commission's report is finally made public interest will be focussed on the recommendations as to the prohibition law.

The judgment of Mr. Taft, rendered before the eighteenth amendment was written, that "our criminal jurisprudence is a national disgrace," is concurred in, we believe, by all thoughtful citizens. Something must be done to simplify legal procedure, clarify rules of practice, crack the security under which the professional criminal now operates, revitalize our courts to the end that punishment shall be certain and swift, and secure the safety of life and property. Technicality had blighted our agencies of justice before prohibition came to plague us; but all that went before, deplorable though it was, was negligible as compared with the orgy of corruption, violence, and private and official lawlessness that has followed prohibition.

Mr. Hoover, in the exercise of his appointive power, has given the commission a certificate of independence. In the words of Senator Norris, "the President has done fine." He has enlisted public sentiment in the commission and the great task it is undertaking.

THE JONES LAW

REAPPORTIONMENT

Someone has figured it out that 32 million people in the United States, more than a fourth of the population, have no direct representation in the lower house of congress. This is because congress has disobeyed the constitutional mandate for a reapportionment at least once in every ten years. Congressmen have not set the public a good example in law observance in this matter, as in some others.

Farm relief legislation is undertaken for the benefit of a class. So is tariff legislation, if we are honest and frank about it. But reapportionment is ordered by the Constitution and demanded by common justice. Whatever the results in the attitude of congress on a controversial question like prohibition, reapportionment cannot honorably be neglected longer. It has not been neglected honorably for eight years. It is the most important duty confronting the extra session because it involves obedience to the Constitution and the principle of equality in representation.

Marion Talley now is represented as having come to the decision that the farm she wants should not be very far from New York. She is going to take lessons there and must not be far away. There has been a suspicion all the time that Marion's farm probably would be located on Broadway.

It may be pretty hard for this generation to work up much interest in the newly discovered letters of Wagner, and even some of the older ones will be quite sure that nothing in them will disturb his fame as a leading batter of the National League when the records speak for themselves.
