GRADUATING TIME

The time of graduation brings its infectious bright spirit into the city, state and nation. Between now and mid-June, thousands of high-hearted young men and young women will leave high school for college that strange, kaleidoscopic university called life, wherein matriculation is so simple and progress so bewilderingly complex, wherein, too, withdrawals so lamentably outnumber graduation. But solemn thoughts ought not to shadow the gay, the bubbling youthful atmosphere of commencement time; rather than depress the graduates with grave ambitions which they in no wise are ready to heed, those who struggle through their courses in the higher sphere ought now to reassemble their lofty motives, their rather tarnished, though once shining ideals, and renew them in the fresh spirit of another May.

Even graduation, though essentially the name, has changed. No longer do keen-witted graduates survey the world a little haughtily from their eminence, and spending another four years finding, or being shunted into, their niches. Their training, for one thing, is more explicit. Many of them select as freshmen the destiny once left with Providence, and the vast machinery of the modern university is capable of concentrating them upon studies which are means to definite ends through instilling meanwhile the broader background requisite to a general education. Of equal importance, perhaps, in the ordered careers of today, are the organizations which serve both students and employers in putting the right man in the proper place. The place, usually, is waiting, and we have learned how to guide the graduate to it. The transition from college to work is more abrupt, if it may be, but in most cases considerably more satisfactory.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT

The extent to which the spirit of one man can live in another is remarkably illustrated by the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes in the case of Rosika Schwimmer.

Madame Schwimmer, a Hungarian, is denied citizenship because she will not take the oath of allegiance without a mental reservation against bearing arms in time of war. The Federal District Court of the Northern Illinois District denied her application for citizenship upon this ground, which is of course usually taken by all Quakers. The Circuit Court of Appeals upset this finding and ruled that she should be admitted. In a 6 to 3 decision the United States Supreme Court upholds the original exclusion. Thus, after years of battling in the courts, the United States denies that principle which has made this country the most celebrated sanctuary in history for freedom of thought.

It may be guessed that the 88-year-old Justice Holmes, in whom the spirit of Thomas Jefferson burns with a brilliance that has become one of the inspiring phenomena of our times, was one of those dissenting from the un-American doctrine. Always preserving that sense of humor which in part accounts for the balance he maintains between the rationalism of the past and the irrationalism of the present, Justice Holmes points out that Madame Schwimmer is over 50 and therefore beyond the legal age for military service. He also calls the attention of the majority opinion to her preference for our form of government, which she thinks the best in the world, and indulges himself in the delicious doubt that so pacific a person as the Madame would restrain us if we decided to have a war. He avails himself of the opportunity to point out how far we are departing in such rulings from the freedom of thought for which America has become an exemplar to the rest of the world. He says:

If there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other, it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us, but freedom for the thought that we hate.

Justice Holmes does not believe that because Madame Schwimmer abhors war she would make a less desirable citizen, and he points out that perhaps a growing number of our own people share her abhorrence. He himself does not regard war as the unmitigated evil which many hold it to be, but he nevertheless would grant the right of those who do so regard it to refuse to bear arms. That is, of course, the point.

"Not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought we hate" is the American equivalent of Voltaire's famous, "I do not agree with a word that you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." It is characteristic of Justice Holmes, as it was characteristic of Mr. Jefferson.

The majority against such a rational and charitable view is perhaps not highly important. We are disposed to think that in another one hundred years, when the American people understand values better, the dissenting opinions of Justice Holmes are much likelier to prevail than the majority opinions against which he so courageously takes up arms. His dissenting opinions, indeed, are the test of America's faith. To doubt their triumph in time is to doubt the ultimate success of what Lord Bryce called "the great American experiment."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

AVIATION AND UGLY VISTAS

HAVING spent so many centuries on the ground, man has fallen into the practice of beautifying only what meets the worm's eye view, as it were. This becomes very evident when one views the scene from a tall building. Ugly roofs and back yards meet the gaze in every direction. Clothes lines and tangled aerials, sagging fences and smoke-begrimed skylights on every hand.

With the increasing popularity of aviation, it has suddenly dawned upon some air-enthusiasts that the roof has become the facade of the house. From an airplane, one obtains an entirely different impression of a town or city than is gained from the ground. It is possible to look behind the scenes and see the things that are hidden from the pedestrian. And the view from the cockpit is not so pleasant.

Flying over the town of Plattsmouth, one may view from the cockpit of an airplane scores of back yards that are far from attractive—rubbish heaps, dilapidated out-houses, etc., and one wonders why the owners don't have the same pride in the rear premises of their home that they manifest for the front yard.

It reminds one of a small boy who
