March is having varieties as usual.

A man seldom does things the way a woman thinks he should.

It looks as if the King of Spain might have to walk Spanish.

Sound judgment: The faculty that sprouts from a collection of blisters.

Naughtiness is not more prevalent than of yore. It is just less sneaking.

Lie: A conception seven parts imagination and three parts yellow streak.

You don't have to be a British labor premier to get in trouble with a coal bill.

There seems to be a growing doubt whether King Alfonso knows his Spanish onions.

Every business man should have a letter opener. If he is not married he ought to buy one.

The good old days were those when young people lived at home even before they were married.

What France needs is some good old-fashioned cabinet makers who sacrifice style for durability.

With so many men getting mysteriously rich, it might be well to have an inquiry into the origin of specie, also.

A man has just left the University of Minnesota having spent ten years there and earning three degrees. First thing we know West Point will be after him.

What is now known as a sheik was known long ago as a "Dandy."

A man would rather be held up by a stranger than thrown down by a friend.

Women always have a suspicion that they are entertaining angels unaware.

We realize that many perils lie ahead of us—and house cleaning is the most formidable.

Rheumatism may have been nature's first primitive effort to establish a weather bureau.

If ancestors know what pride they inspire, there must be a lot of astonishment on the other side.

In these bootleg days it isn't the neighbor's income that is puzzling so much as the how come.

Hatred for strangers probably has its genesis when the child is told to speak its piece for the nice man.

We're with the young people as a rule, but they must remember that all that glitters is not champagne.

The ability to talk may convince you that man is superior to the monkey if you don't listen to the talk.

No, that was not a thunderstorm you heard. Just those delegates at London in argument over submarines.

Another sad disillusionment is going back to the old swimming hole, only to find that some one has pulled out the plug.

In a great many cases the father-in-law of the man who claims to be self-made is the real architect.

Among those who charge violently are rams, fullbacks and a 17-year-old buying on the Old Man's account.

If he has the true scientific mind, he wishes he could live to see whether people inherit a taste for moonshine.

Even if you don't care particularly for the way her hair is cut, remember, son, she is still your grandmother.

Gandhi is probably doing a hitch hike. He'll walk for a while and then be picked up and given a ride to the next jail.

It may be only imagination, but some of the great old classics read as if the writer had forgotten all about movie rights.

There is enough conscience left in the world for every nation to be shocked at the way the others treat undeveloped peoples.

Americans live too fast, according to foreign visitors, who evidently overlook the fact that you have to keep right on the jump in this country to stay alive.

In the Senate the other day a clause was inserted in the tariff bill cutting the import duty on carillons.

To save you the trouble of rushing to the dictionary, carillons are sets of bells installed in church towers or on the top of college chapels.

We are faced with trying times these days. For we are on the verge of the period of the changing of tires:

of the putting up of awnings and screens and the pulling down of storm doors; of the spreading of earth sweeteners, and the planting of the seed of lettuce plants that have gone before and proved good; of the swinging of golf clubs, the sorrow of the tender grass outsider and of prominently located vases inside the home; of the will to laziness, and the urge of springtime emotions. In fact, we are on the verge of the period of the perennial renaissance of human nature. So, on with the dance, and let joy be only a bit refined.

MR. TAFT AND MR. LINCOLN

Mr. Taft's posthumous letter to Prof. Irving Fisher revising his former opinion and accepting national prohibition as a mandate from the people emphasizes the totally opposite conception of citizenship held by Abraham Lincoln.

When a two-thirds majority of Congress and three-fourths of state legislatures adopt a Constitutional amendment, and a majority of each House of Congress passes a law to enforce it, the rules of the game of popular government are that all living under that Government must obey. It is not patriotic, it is not sportsmanlike, to evade or disobey.

I am appeal to such a man to change his attitude toward the enforcement of that law because much as he may disagree with prohibition—I mean as a principle—he can't afford to have his opposition to prohibition impair influence of the Constitution and laws of the country or wreck the future of the society whose basis must rest upon them.

The crisis in which Mr. Lincoln refused to acquiesce against his judgment in any such mandate, whether from the people or the courts, was the most thrilling chapter in American history. It precipitated the Lincoln-Douglas debates, to which the people came in such multitudes as no such encounter had ever attracted.

Mr. Lincoln was aroused by the Dred Scott decision, which held that a slave was property and subject to the laws of property in the territories, and the fugitive slave laws, which obligated the people of the North to help the South catch its runaway slaves.

Against the judgment of powerful sympathizers with abolition such as Horace Greeley, then editor of the New York Tribune, Lincoln insisted in debate after debate that he owed no such duty as a citizen as that enunciated by Mr. Taft in the Yale address.

Judge Douglas contends that whatever community wants slaves has a right to have them; and so they have if slavery is right, but if slavery is wrong they have no right to do wrong. He says that slaves like other property may be carried into new territory; and that is true if slavery is right, but if slavery is wrong there can be no such right.

Lincoln said in one of the debates that another Dred Scott decision would make the slaves property in even the free states. He foresaw that the time would come when the slave owners, who controlled both Congress and the United States Supreme Court, would force acquiescence in slavery upon the whole country.

It was this realization that impelled him to reject all counsel other than that of his own conscience and insist that it was his duty to save the country from such a fate. He rejected political expediency, which Mr. Taft could accept, holding that to acquiesce in what it knew to be wrong, could never save but would destroy the Republic.

The analogy between what he charged the slave owners were doing and what the prohibitionists have done—that is, forcing upon all the people by sheer power of law what they themselves believe—is very powerful.

After his debates with Douglas the country was in no doubt of where Mr. Lincoln stood. He had defied Congress and the courts. He had challenged either to make him acquiesce in what he knew to be wrong. He lost the senatorial election, but he won the debates.

In the end all those who, like Mr. Greeley, had thought he went too far, acknowledged him right. Such was our most illustrious American, beautifully characterized by John Drinkwater as "A man for the ages."

Truly, there can be no comparison between right and wrong, and the struggle between them is eternal. No sound conception of citizenship, or of patriotism, or of good sportsmanship, can admit the right of one great segment of the people to put upon another great segment of the people any law which has not their consent.

There are a great many people who formerly went to Florida every winter who are now being represented down there by their baseball team.

AVIATOR'S WOOING

"Oh, come to my arms, with a promise, my dear! You're the sweetest of girls that I know. I'd pilot you, safely through many a year. With a love that forever must grow."

"And must I believe that you mean what you say? That you fancy me trifling, or vain? You know that my thought goes a-soaring each day— That I live on a very high plane."

"Oh, yea, and I know of your thin linen wings, As you ride on the tides of the air; But chances are big you'll be changing those things For the kind that the bright angels wear."

—THOMAS EMMET MOORE.

But you'll notice that Mr. Ford doesn't investigate the drink record of a prospective customer before selling him a flivver.

the NEW Polarine THE MODERN MOTOR OIL

"outclasses any oil I ever used"

High praise from one of Nebraska's veteran motorists! But not surprising! The new process used in refining the new Polarine removes all the wax and tar. It cuts the carbon residue in half. It vastly increases lubricating efficiency. It gives an oil that lasts longer in good condition than any old process oil. Neither heat nor cold can prevent the new Polarine from giving safe and satisfactory lubrication.

Here is a true premium quality oil by every test and standard—"The Modern Oil."

No advance in price—at Red Crown Service Stations and Dealers everywhere in Nebraska.
