WHICH WAY?

Chairman Britton of the House Naval Affairs Committee thinks our delegation at the London conference should come home and the United States should proceed with our interrupted naval program.

This utter dis-sympathy with the ideal of naval disarmament reflects a surprisingly large body of opinion in all the maritime nations. For the conference to fall and the race in naval armaments to go on it would impose and the peril to peace which inevitably results from all such rivalries would occasion exultation not in this land of arrogant self-sufficiency alone, but even among the war-beggared Italians.

Yet the world well knows what risks are involved in that policy of laissez faire which brought on the great cataclysm of 1914. There are not merely economic risks which could easily involve the warlike nations in bankruptcy, but there are political perils at thought of which civilization might well shudder. The effect of war is to demoralize society and lodge power in the hands of mobs. The political consequences to Europe after the World War were almost more terrible than the war itself. The insecurity felt by a country so far removed from revolution as our own is a political consequence of the giant struggle which first plunged the nations into war and then tossed them to revolution. The futility of dealing with the ultimate consequences was illustrated by our own unhappy expedition to Archangel. We do not even know how we came to be in Archangel. It was an incident that dumb show of resistance set up by the rest of the warring nations when war at last made of Russia a bloody bedlam.

All of the five Powers represented at the London conference know the folly of that preparedness which is made a patriotic fetish. They would like to act the part of wisdom. The difficulty is that they cannot do so together because the French are afraid of the Italians and the British are in turn afraid of the French. What it would mean for each of them to be fully prepared against the other is for the most part lost sight of, though more than one thoughtful on-looker through the last great war has warned us that civilization cannot survive another. That the French could at length fare any better than Germany did by venturing all on the stake of arms is unlikely, nor is it easy to believe that out of another war in which the world pulled down a bully there would not come other revolutions and more political chaos.

Europe still owes the United States $11,000,000,000 on account of the last war. In England the people are giving one-third of their incomes to the Government on account of the last war. All over Central Europe there is misery and degradation as a consequence of the last war. In Germany, a great industrial country deprived of raw materials from its colonies, the people have forgotten luxury as a result of the last war and are thankful for bread. Throughout the British Isles and most of Western Europe, because of the last war, the twin specters of unemployment and hunger are on parade. In the United States, largely because of the last war, 72 cents of every dollar paid to the Government is on account of war. More men are under arms in Europe than before 1914. The burden of arms by land and sea is greater everywhere than at any time in history, and everywhere the people are less able to bear it. Yet like the Greek cities, which destroyed themselves destroying one another, the nations discern security in the deceitful countenance of destruction.

THE WRIGHT PLANE

The original Wright plane, with which the Wright brothers made their historic first flight on December 17, 1903, over the sand dunes at Kitty Hawk, North Carolina, reposes in the British Museum in London.

Orville Wright, feeling keenly that he had not received adequate recognition of his invention from the Smithsonian Institution, loaned it to England, where it has remained on exhibition since March, 1928.

There have been made many attempts to smooth out the difficulties between Mr. Wright and the Smithsonian Institution, all failing. Just now a new effort is proceeding which gives greater promise of success. Senator Robinson, who is a regent of the Smithsonian Institution and at present a delegate to the London Conference, has taken the matter in hand and expects to use his diplomatic powers to effect a compromise. It is to be hoped that he may succeed.

To the Wrights properly belongs the fame of having first made successful flight in a heavier-than-air machine. Every plane in the world today is constructed on lines that are basically the same as those to be found in the historic machine now in the British Museum.

The first of planes should be here, in the land of its invention, the home of its inventors. It not only was invented here, but was here financed and developed and flown. Aviation, in America at least, will wish Senator Robinson success in his efforts to have the plane returned to this country.

The fame of the Wrights is too well established to be affected by academic claims that should for any reason seem to suggest its lessening, and the Smithsonian Institution serves too great a purpose to permit the major interest of the people to remain subordinated to the expert conclusions of a few men, however honestly arrived.
