The Iowa-Nebraska Light & Power Co. who are serving this city with electricity and artificial gas, are to have a force of workmen here Sunday to complete the laying of their pipe line to connect with the large twenty-four inch gas mains of the Missouri Valley Pipeline Co., which is supplying natural gas in this section.

The local company has had their work held up pending the settlement of the franchise question with the city and now that this has been removed, the injunction against the company dismissed, the work can go on to completion.

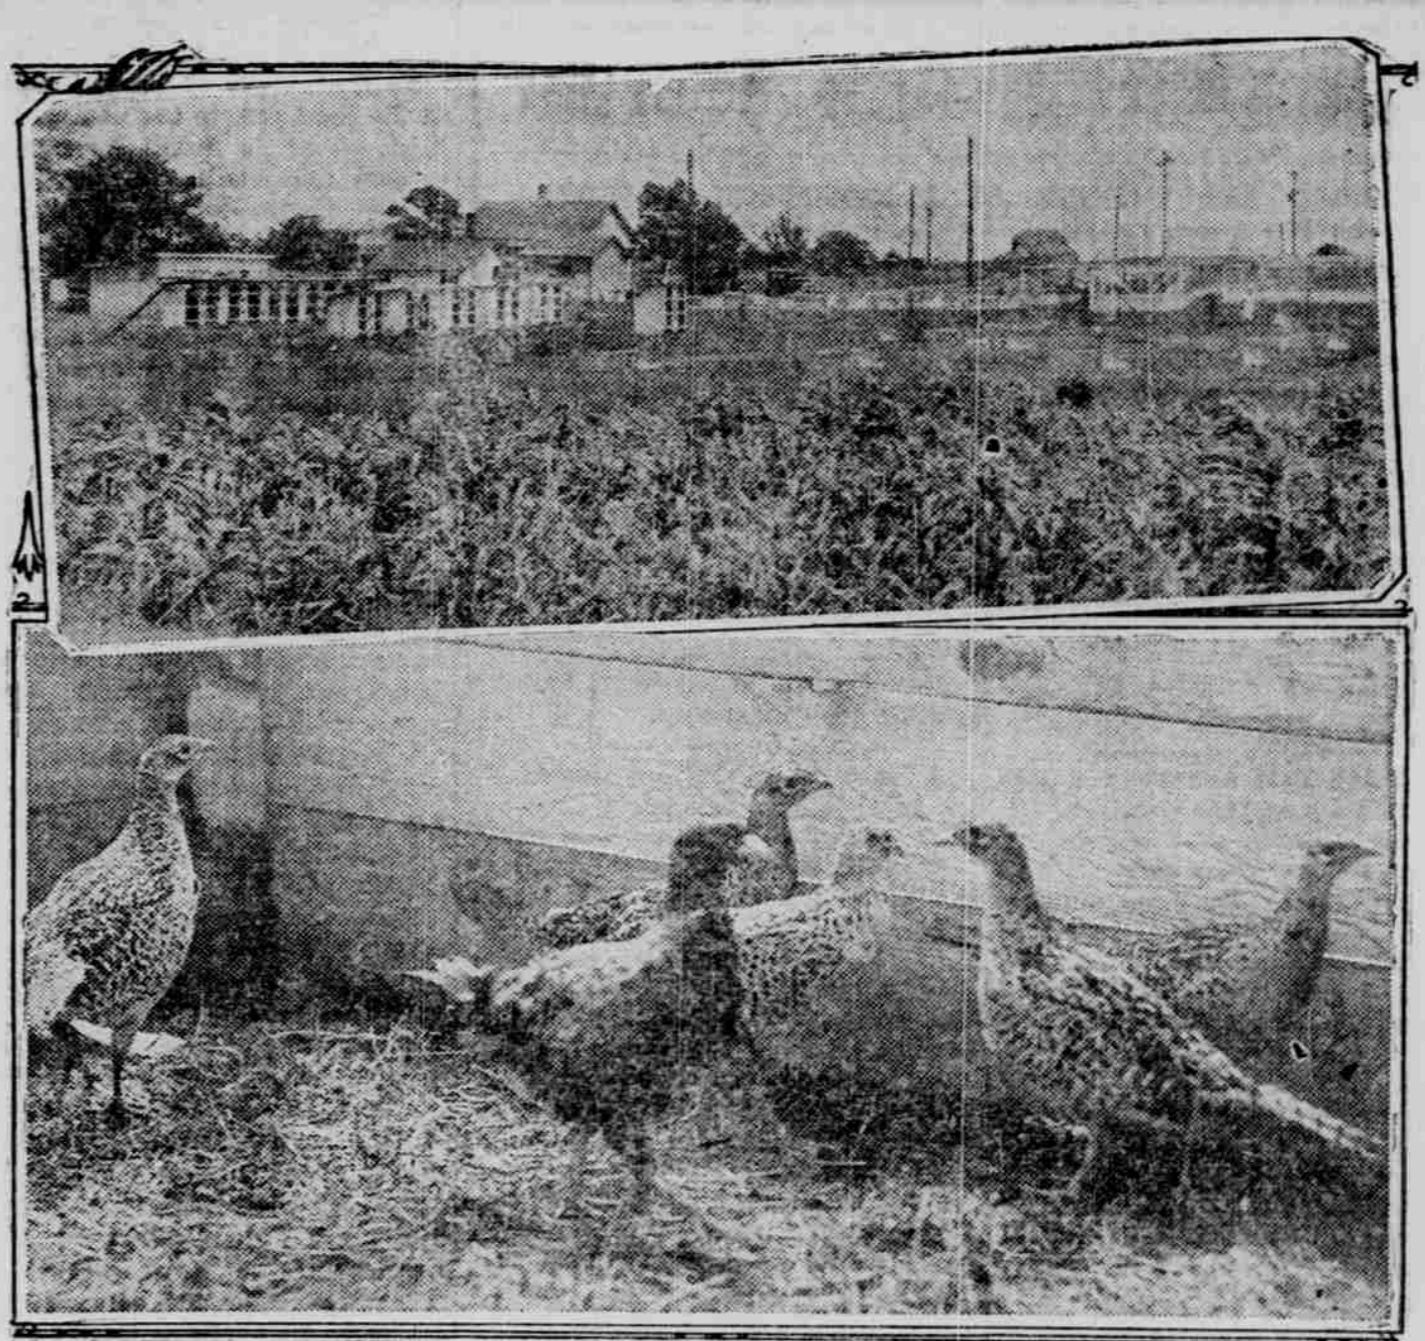

It is expected that in ten days or two weeks the patrons here will be placed on the natural gas service and hereafter be supplied with this fuel for heat and power.

This is the first line of natural gas to come into this territory and its advent has been watched with interest as furnishing the possibilities of a clean, reliable supply of fuel for power and heating and at a rate that would permit the use by large manufacturing plants where a great deal of the gas can be used.

The United Gas Service Co. is also moving into this field and their lines will soon be in this territory and already workmen are reaching here to carry on the preliminary work of getting the line right of way arranged and ready for the construction force.

PHEASANT RAISING A PROFITABLE NEBRASKA INDUSTRY

There are only a couple of large game farms between the Mississippi river and the west coast, and one of them is the Lancaster Game Farm, located near Lincoln. It is a pheasant farm owned by Lawrence Farrell, who began it as a spare time project and hobby. Last year, however, he raised over 500 pheasants, which he sold to surrounding states for their game preserves or breeding purposes and also to the markets as game food.

The pheasant is essentially a wild bird and can never be tamed. Therefore it is necessary to make use of other kinds of fowls to hatch the pheasant eggs and raise the young birds. The Japanese silk bantam, which is a most unusual chicken in that it is the only type that has black skin and black bones, is noted for being the best of mothers. During the season between the first of April until the middle of July, these hens hatch the pheasant eggs and are kept with the chicks until they are six weeks old. The baby chicks have to learn their foster mother's call and are taught by her to eat. They require a great deal of care for the first three weeks. The pheasant hen does not make a nest for her eggs, but lays them on the ground so that they must be gathered up and put under the bantam. A pheasant hen will average about 71 eggs in a season.

After the chicks are six weeks old they are removed to the fly pen which is a wire pen 100 feet wide, 150 feet long and 7 feet high. A small inside runway is used in which to feed the young birds. It is fitted out with a trap door so that they may be caught at feeding time as it is almost impossible to catch them when they have any room at all in which to get around. This pen is wired one foot under the ground and sl inches out at right angles to prevent animals from burrowing under.

The farm has six breeding pens which will hold five hens and a male pheasant. The pens have no floorings, nor do they need to have floorings for roosting, as the pheasants always roost on the ground no matter how inclement the weather. A good many of the pens are movable, thus allowing them to be kept on fresh ground. All the pens usually have about a two foot moulding to keep the birds from being frightened at prowling animals. They are particularly nervous and will never allow man or animal to approach them without making unceasing efforts to get away. In spite of this nervous disposition however they are easily raised and are very healthy. An especially prepared ration is fed to the birds until they are six weeks old when they are put on a straight grain ration. It has been proven that pheasants eat about only one fifth as much as chickens.

There are about ten acres in all on the farm. Some 150 Japanese silk bantams were raised last year and a few English call ducks besides the pheasants. This fall the farm will be stocked with partridge, wild turkeys and bob white quail.

The golden, silver and Lady Amherst pheasants are show birds and the Mongolian, English ring neck and versicolor are the game birds. Pheasant is claimed to be one of the choicest meat delicacies that can be procured.

Iowa-Nebraska Co. to Complete Gas Line in Week

Force Will Be Here to Complete Laying Line to Connect With Missouri Valley Co.

HAVE EXCELLENT ORDER

One of the most impressive things that marked the large crowds at the Cass county fair was the splendid order preserved both in the day and the evening by Sheriff Bert Reed and Deputy Sheriff Young, with the assistance of the city marshal of Weeping Water. The crowds were the largest in years and the mixed gathering one in which some disorder could be expected but it is a fine tribute to the fair management and the officers that everything was in the best of shape and no disturbances or disorder to mark the large crowds and the visitors to the fair given the best opportunity to enjoy the fair in their own way.

Sheriff Reed and Deputy Young were at Weeping Water a greater part of each day and evening and kept check of any strangers that might have drifted in for any illegal purposes.
