THE LONG TRAIL IN BRONZE
 Illinois is gathering replicas of Lincoln statues for the reconstructed tomb which President Hoover will dedicate June 17. When the renovation is completed, the Springfield shrine will be adorned with bronze copies depicting the long trail from wilderness cabin to the presidency and journey's end. Five of the statues are to portray the prairie years. These are copies of Crunelle's onitor at Freeport, Ill., and his roughly dressed soldier of the Black Hawk War at Dixon; Dorado Taft's gaunt lawyer who appears to lean against a courtroom table in Urbana, and two horse figures, the erect young ranger and the caped circuit-riding lawyer, produced especially for the tomb by Fred M. Torrey. Other well known effigies will be those of Weineman's seated Lincoln at the Kentucky birthplace, St. Gaudens' standing figure in Chicago, Borglum's Hall of Fame head, and Daniel Chester French's pensive man with clasped hands in Lincoln, Neb., and his brooding bronze in the majestic memorial by the Potomac. Henceforth the city on the Sangamon will hold as much for the lover of fine arts as for the lover of history. Illinois is making it a tomb of Lincoln, by the sculptors, for the people.

ENCHANTMENT OF DISTANCE

Alan J. Villiers, the Australian explorer, writer and lecturer, alludes with a smile to the prevalent misconception among all sorts of persons that there is more romance anywhere and everywhere in the world than at home. "It's quite a common idea," he comments, "that nothing wonderful happens in our immediate environment, or in our town, or in our country, and anything strange or interesting must happen elsewhere. The contrary is the fact, he explains. There is much near at hand that is extraordinary, and we can not overlook it if we use our senses. It is not necessary to travel afar in quest of the strange or entralling, or to go through dangers and adventures in order to find something interesting or thrilling. We may discover something exceptionally sensational without moving, or, in other words, by simply thinking of persons and happenings and places which are familiar to us.
 Why we have this erroneous idea is plain to our understanding. Everything near us is like everything near us, being commonplace. We get into the habit of taking everybody and everything for granted. We are as commonplace by our habits of thinking and doing as the persons and things that are part of our everyday existence. We live in a routine.
 We dream of great opportunities in distant places. We vision enormous wealth that might be procured at some daring and trouble. We revel in imagination in the marvels that we could run across in distant places and among strange people. About these beings, things and localities there is a brightness which makes them alluring. Nearby everybody and everything are dull, and our own thoughts of them are dull.
 The fairest opportunities are in another city, but in our own. It may be that, in exceptional cases, a young man having particular talent which can not be applied in his home town would do better somewhere else; or that the ability of one is not recognized by those who know him well or too well. But with the average person the best place is where he lives, as he knows the citizens and the conditions. Other places are enchanting because they are different. There are excellent chances here for those who are capable of seeing and using them.

AMBASSADOR DE MADARIAGA

It is an excellent testimonial to the Spanish Republic that it can command the services of so distinguished a scholar as Salvador de Madariaga, and a most flattering appraisal of the United States is expressed in the appointment of this eminent and able man as Ambassador to our country, which has just recognized the new regime.
 Widely known here by his books on international subjects and his contributions to periodicals, De Madariaga stands in the front rank of the intellectuals who support Spanish republicanism. His extensive experience on various League of Nations disarmament commissions has given him an extraordinary grasp of world problems. His delightful literary style and his eloquence enable De Madariaga to express his views in effective fashion as writer, teacher, publicist, diplomat and lecturer, all fields in which he has made a name for himself.
 Recognition of the new republic by the State Department makes it possible for De Madariaga to assume his portfolio as soon as he can terminate his lecture series in Mexico City. The United States, as a matter of international courtesy, waited for nations on the Continent to grant recognition before taking the step, just as European Governments wait on action by Washington before recognizing new administrations in Latin America. Our action follows recognition by France, Germany, Great Britain and her dominions, by Belgium, Sweden, Portugal and several Balkan nations, as well as by a number of Latin American countries. In the week's interim, Ambassador Laughlin, at Madrid, had investigated the new Government and had submitted a favorable report to Secretary Stimson.
 America's action will be of tremendous assistance to Spain in her early days of democracy. Undoubtedly pressure will be put upon the people by the monarchists of the right and the radicals of the left. With the republic formally admitted into the family of nations, its cause is strengthened. The Old World's new republic properly rejoices at this mark of confidence and esteem by the New World's oldest.

DOGWOOD DAYS

On hillsides high above the road, the dogwood is in bloom. Dimpled masses of breath-taking beauty, its pure white patches drift in pastel tracteries of red bud and spring green. This April there are more flowers than last. A winter severely cold works a hardship; one like that just passed, when creeks freeze less often, sets the stage for a performance unrivaled. Now the creamy bracts, or petal-like leaves, form rain-washed saucers holding small clusters of faintly yellow blooms. Flowers, foliage, fruit—dogwood's way of life is that of most trees and shrubs, but few are so generous with beauty in each outgiving. For whatever the season, dogwood is never done. Before the blossoms have blown away its glossy leaves are ready for May and summer time. Then at length comes autumn and its blazes crimson. Nor is that the end. After the foliage fire has burned out, deep red berries keep the branches aglow for winter birds. Everyone should follow a dogwood through the year sometime. Find one. Seldom is there a better spring to begin the companionship.

HANDLES, QUAIL, CHERRIES AND TOMATOES

Mr. Coolidge has given a lifelong devotion to the sacred principle of a protective tariff but even Homer nods and, to the dismay of his fellow votaries in the protective temple, he lowered the rates on paint-brush handles and Mexican quail. Scoffers may say that relaxing the Fordney-McCumber impositions on these two quaint items is about as helpful as squirting a child's water gun at a conflagration; nevertheless paint-brush handles and Mexican quail have become rubric words in the Coolidge annals.
 Things fare not so well as to cherries, sulphured or in brine, and tomatoes, prepared or preserved. The Tariff Commission thought the tariff on those eatable should be reduced, but Mr. Hoover returned the recommendation and asked the Tariff Commission to reconsider its decision "upon the basis of the forthcoming crops and make another report." He does not propose lightly to blot the Hawley-Smoot escutcheon.

What a day may bring forth for the new-born republic, there is no predicting; the factors are too numerous and diverse, the possibilities too hazy. But of all who wish Spain a happy issue out of her present uncertainties and a future rich in prosperity and progress, none does so more heartily than the United States of America.
