We wish that the owner of the cat that came to our house last night would come and get 'em.

As to the recent contract bridge war, was the matter of reparations ever settled satisfactorily?

The only man who hasn't kicked about taxes or something this year is the snow man in the back yard.

"He's an ardent dry sympathizer," so we overheard a person described, "but not at all obnoxious when sober."

Candor, 1932 model, as noted in a Sunday advertisement: "I have any size house or tract, on easy terms; some worth the money."

There aren't any more wars of offense; not as long as the resourceful invader can dig up a bandit to crush.

"Impossible" people have so increased in number in society that anything else is absolutely impossible.

The Swedish discoverer of the theory that life on the planet began in hot water doesn't give the inhabitants credit enough for holding their own.

Washington reports that politics "will take a seat in the back row" in congress for the next few weeks. They must be revarnishing the pews up in front.

A policeman in California found employment for 140 jobless in one month. Which is the best way of moving them off street corners we ever heard of.

Things are not so dark as they seem. Only ten radio announcers out of about 3,000 applications were approved and turned loose to weary the listening ear.

Modern science has also broadened the scope of the old-fashioned boy who left cracker crumbs in his bed. Now he eats molasses-dipped popcorn in the family sedan.

A national broadcasting chain answers critics by saying it hasn't a single crooner on its salary list. But, of course, the chain, being new in the business, probably doesn't know what a crooner is.

The numerous and different portraits of George Washington on the new stamps remind us of the museum in which were "two mummies of an ancient—one as a boy and the other as he was in adult life."

A BUSINESS LOOKS TO ITSELF

No branch of American industry has suffered more from disorganization than soft coal mining. The difficulties of this business go much farther back than the economic conditions of the last two years. Both operators and mine workers have called upon the government to help at various times and in various ways. But it has been increasingly apparent that the welfare of the business lay primarily with its own leaders and workers. The chief need has been a degree of co-operation among the mine units that would not be in violation of the antitrust laws or contrary to the general public interest.

An announcement of one form of co-operation among 112 leading coal companies of Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia and Tennessee is particularly interesting and suggestive of possible results. This is a tentative agreement to set up a central agency for the marketing and distribution of a major part of the 90 million tons of bituminous coal produced annually in the area. A spokesman for the concerns states that "we all look with confidence to the future in view of what has happened." If that is possible for a business so beset with problems as has been this section of mining, then everybody should take heart. The full nature and possible operation of the plan brought forward would demand careful scrutiny. But if the coal business is beginning to find the right road out of its troubles, it may afford encouragement and a wholesome example generally.

CHICAGO AND KING GEORGE

The private war between Chicago and King George which was conducted by Chicago's recent Mayor, William Hale Thompson, subsided when Mr. Thompson retired. Ostensibly Chicago and the British monarch are now at peace. However, a number of Chicagoans feel sensitive as to the King. Their interests are quite different from those of their former Mayor. Not being in office or in quest of office, their sentiments are not political. What they are after is sleep.

The trouble is that King George has waked up sundry Chicagoans before 5 o'clock in the morning. He doesn't do it often—in fact, he does it rarely. But he may do it again.

When King George speaks over the radio to America, he causes a large circle of Chicagoans to set their alarm clocks. The King has more friends than critics in Chicago, and they are willing to do the unprecedented to hear what he has to say. So up they pop before daylight, and tune in. These have no complaint. They have an understanding of the King and his love of his subjects, and they like him for it.

But much of Chicago lives in apartment buildings, and unfortunately the walls of many of these apartments are thin. The neighbors are favored, whether or no, by the radio. Because when King George speaks at 11 o'clock in the morning in England, an admiring family group gathers around the radio before break of day in Chicago. As the monarch's voice rolls out full toned from the loudspeaker and penetrates into the apartments below or above, other families begin to stir in their slumber, and to rouse. "What's the matter with the Joneses, that they've got their radio on at this hour?" becomes a plaint. And later on in the day they hear it was King George.

Chicago is less disturbed, however, than might be expected in view of the incitement by its recent Mayor. After all, it is quite a novelty to be waked up by a king.

NEBRASKA'S EMERGENCY

Dispatches of the last few days have painted a tragic picture of the conditions in seven of Nebraska's northeastern counties with respect to live stock. They speak of forced sales of live stock that was needed on the farms at low prices and worse than that they refer to the actual death of stock from starvation. One man from that territory is quoted as saying that with 10 carloads of feed on hand the requirements is for a hundred carloads.

If these dispatches are to be relied upon, and presumably they are, the emergency is acute and prevalent, and not one that is threatened. Hitherto the general impression has been that contributions of feed would be needed and that they are coming in. The condition portrayed in these dispatches indicate, however, that if the contributions are to serve their purpose they must reach their destination at once, when stock is being cleared off he farmers at sacrifice prices, or actual death from starvation has set in, it is clear that a delay in making the contributions defeats the aim. When stock feed is all gone, there remain then only days, and a few days, to lend and effective aid.

Apparently the Red Cross has the situation pretty well in hand so far as food is concerned, but the matter of keeping the stock alive is presenting more of a problem. For some reason the state as a whole has not come to a realization of the need. That is indicated by the late picture of the stock conditions. There is just as great a supply of feed in the state now as there will be at any time this season and it would thus appear that the state has as much capacity now to afford relief as it will have later. And if anything effective is to be accomplished it appears that it must be accomplished at once.

We should remember that our fellow Nebraskans have come to their present condition through no fault of their own. Their crops have for two years been destroyed by drought or grasshoppers or both. — Hastings Tribune.

Can this country be so forgetful that it is necessary to "sell" George Washington at tremendous expense before the 200th anniversary of his birth can be fittingly celebrated? We are not so much that we can afford to disregard the memory of a benefactor who happens to have been a long time dead.

With the ladies wearing big fur collars that hug their ears and hats that tilt downward until they almost meet the collars, they should not feel offended when friends fail to recognize them on the streets. Rare is the woman who can be recognized by the tip of her nose.

GOING TO SCHOOL AGAIN

Owen D. Young went to a school for a day at Van Hornesville, N. Y., recently. True, he may have been demonstrating the value of his own gift, for he had just built the school as a present to his native village, but his day sitting in front of the blackboard suggests that in these times of change more of us might follow his example. Look at the subjects now occupying the front pages of the newspapers. They must make their memory for the A B C's they once learned and have long forgotten. How often they must regret that they have not gone to school since they left it.

An excellent opportunity for going to school again is afforded in the economics course now being offered by radio. Ten broadcasts on economic subjects by well-known authorities have just come to an end. They were received with such enthusiasm that the National Advisory Council on Radio in Education, under whose auspices they were delivered, has decided to continue them. The new series, under the general title of "Roads of Economic Recovery," started on January 9 with a talk on "International Trade Balances, Gold and Prosperity," by Prof. James Harvey Rogers of Yale University. Other talks will be given every Saturday evening until March 12.

Mr. Young's day was spent browsing through a course in civics. Today economics is a large part of civics and the radio listener has the same chance that Mr. Young took of renewing his education, but, unlike him, of doing so without having to build a school or even to move away from his own fireside.
