Platte Valley Airs Protests to Tri-County

Farmers Assert Lowering of River Would Hurt Crops, At Hearing Before Tilley.

Lincoln, Sept. 30.—Eight Platte river valley farmers Monday told State Engineer A. C. Tilley at a hearing on protests against the Tri-county Power and Irrigation district's application for water rights that the valley's sub-surface water level has lowered in recent years.

As a result, they said, crops are not assured and farmers are having difficulties in an area where years ago sub-surface water provided sufficient moisture.

The hearing will continue Tuesday but Tilley decided not more than 10 witnesses will be called by either side.

Farmers Protest. Farmers, irrigators, ditch companies, irrigation districts and other groups are opposing the granting of Platte river water rights to the tri-county project, which last week was given a 10 million dollar federal allotment.

Fred J. Hage told of good crops on his land years ago and said they were due to sub-surface water, but since the Pathfinder dam was built in Wyoming the Platte valley water level has lowered and moisture is inadequate. He is president of the Hall County Farmers union.

His brother, William A. Hage, said crop failures in the last 10 years were due to less water in the river.

Well Levels Drop. Emil Stolley, who has farmed a Platte valley tract near Grand Island 70 years, said seepage from the stream assures a crop if sub-irrigation is available at the proper time. He also said he had good crops until the last 10 or 12 years.

Last year, he said, the water level in his wells dropped two or three feet and the river remained dry 200 days.

Paul Good, attorney for the tri-county project, attempted to show pump irrigation has aided in reducing the sub-surface water level. The witnesses opposed taking any water from the Platte river for the tri-county project.

Other witnesses included Hans H. Gulzok, Hall county; Arthur C. Denman, Hall county; James Kuz, Wood River; Walter S. Ashton, Shelton, and Thomas Lewis, Kearney.

Kunz said he knew a lot of water is being pumped out of the Platte river and that the water level drops during the pumping season.

Lewis had prepared some charts to back up his claims of a lower water level.

More than 100 persons attended the hearing in the house of representatives chamber.

On Sunday their friends here gave them a complete surprise when they went to the Anderson home in number about one hundred and thirty where they properly celebrated the passing of the fortieth wedding anniversary of this estimable couple. The dinner was eaten on the lawn under the shade of the trees and a most enjoyable time was had.

This couple was married forty years ago in Weeping Water and have resided the greater portion of the time here. Mrs. Anderson was formerly Miss Anna Christensen.

FALL BEHIND IN PAYMENTS. London, Sept. 29.—The Anglo-Italian payments agreement thru which British firms are supposed to receive payment for goods supplied to Italy, is not working well, and some quarters are calling for official action to speed it up. The main provision was that Italian importers of British goods were compelled to discharge their debts by making payment in lire into an official Italian clearing account. British importers of Italian goods were invited, but not compelled, to make payment in sterling into a special clearing account at the Bank of England, and the sterling in that account was to be used for discharging the debts due to British exporters in respect of the lira payments made by Italian importers into their clearing account. So far the scheme has worked badly. Up to August 21, only 1,484,000 pounds had been paid to British exporters out of the sterling account and arrears due amounted to 1,834,000 pounds.
