Mrs. J. G. Wunderlich, who has been spending some time in Plattsmouth at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Lottie Rosencrans, accompanied by the latter spent the day Sunday in Nehawka and returned to Plattsmouth that evening.

C. R. Troop of Plattsmouth was a visitor near Nehawka early this week, where he was having a well sunk deeper to provide an adequate supply of water for his stock. Later, he went to Weeping Water to look after business matters.

J. H. Steffens and family and Albert Anderson and family were Sunday guests at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Zohns, who reside in Oteo county. Mr. Anderson says a great deal of the land down that way has been plowed for the fall sowing of grain.

The beautiful and delicious cake which drew such favorable comment at the 43rd wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Murdoch was baked by Mrs. Troy Murdoch. Among other articles on the menu was a bountiful supply of fried chicken and home made ice cream, making up a dinner fit for a king.

Don Philpot, Roy Haslam and Dale Philpot, who have been in the north for some three weeks, where they were viewing the country and trying their luck at fishing, returned home Sunday evening and tell of enjoying their vacation a great deal, but say old Cass county looked good to them on their return.

FLOOD COSTS $500,000

McAllen, Tex.—Delayed dispatches from the storm devastated Mexican coastal area in the lowlands west of Tampico said Mexican authorities estimated flood damage at nearly $500,000.

The red brick house with its gleaming shutters and white steps leading down to the narrow street does not differ greatly from its neighbors. Nor is it very different from those stately structures found in the older sections of Baltimore or Philadelphia. Yet as one lifts the knocker of this door, perhaps not once, but several times—a tiny white haired lady opens the door, and the house becomes unique. "Prim" is the word that immediately enters the mind when the visitor sees Mrs. Amanda Homan, 90, of Gettysburg, Pa.

Sitting in her quiet home surrounded by the heavy dark furniture of the Civil War period it is easy to vision the hours of the beginning of the terrific Gettysburg struggles of July 1st, 2nd, and 3rd. This independent lady with the sparkling eyes tells its story. She was a girl of 17—a dressmaker at the Bluebaugh hotel during the Civil War.

"We had heard the cannon shots early that morning, Wednesday, at Seminary Ridge. We baked bread in the forenoon. After the fighting became more steady about 10 o'clock, Mrs. Bluebaugh said 'We'd better fix something for supper. No tellin' if we'll have time later'. After noon there was a lull, then the severe fighting began nearer the town about two o'clock. We rushed to the cellar for protection. We hovered there wondering how long it would last. Crash of bullets became so terrible about four o'clock that Mr. Bluebaugh went upstairs. He was met by an officer who demanded 'Where is the proprietor?' . . . 'You'll have to get out as quick as you can. This building can be set afire any time. Sharpshooters have taken possession.' 'Yes, yes,' said the fiery young girl again becomes a lady of 90, 'well, we were ordered out of the hotel.'"

The group—Mr. and Mrs. Bluebaugh, a farmer who had come into town, and Amanda—were slipped out of the house. They only glimpsed sharpshooters firing out of windows. The officer led them down an alley. Bullets whizzed over their heads. Finally they reached the outskirts of the town and were left to go through a cornfield—the present site of the National Cemetery—to the Baltimore Pike. They half ran until they were some distance from the town.

As they went along the road they passed one man sitting on a porch looking down at the stub that a few hours before had held his hand. Blood ran from it. An old blanket, his only medical supply, lay beside him. Many such sights met them as they went down the road. At the end of five miles they came to the home of friends. There, the next morning, little Laura Bluebaugh was born.

By Sunday reports came that fighting had ceased. The hotel-keeper decided to return to the town. He left with the understanding that if he did not come back to the farm by the following morning Amanda would know it was safe for her to come into town. Jacob Bluebaugh did not return. Monday the "slip of a girl" walked the five miles up the Pike to town.

"I would never come up that Baltimore Pike to-day," she exclaims, "the road was full of wounded men and I met long wagons hauling hundreds of dead wrapped only in rugs or bed clothing."

It was necessary to dispose of the bodies quickly. As coffins were scarce the men were wrapped in blankets or rugs and dropped into hurriedly made graves. Many were taken up later.

The town's favorite amusement spot, the ten-pin alley, turned its activities to making rough boxes for bodies that had to be shipped.

The Bluebaughs found their hotel in quite a demolished condition. Soldiers had been killed in the living room. One shell entered the wall on the second floor, leaving a pile of mortar about four feet in diameter and three feet high, passed through a door on the opposite side, hit the parlor stove stored on the landing and broke it into pieces. The partition between two of the downstairs rooms had been shot away.

Then Amanda heard of the death of her friend, Jennie Wade. "I remember having talked to her on the first morning of the battles. I stepped out to get a glass of water. She was standing across the street at the home of her sister, Mrs. McClellan. I called 'Jen, are you moving?'—then she was killed Friday morning! Terrible, terrible!" She pauses a little in remembrance of this young girl, then goes on "But wonderful, wonderful, the people that lived here, and only Jen killed."

Stories drifted in from the town of neighbors who hid men of both armies behind barrels, in woodsheds, or in cellars, because "they couldn't bear to see them good lookin' young men killed."

From one house up the street came the story of the carpenter's wife who pushed a southern officer off her doorstep and into the street. Screaming, "Your sharpshooters'll not shoot any union boys from this house," she bolted the door with pieces of lumber.

On Tuesday Amanda went out to the fields. At the spot of the hardest fighting, now marked by the high water monument, bodies still lay four and six deep.

In Gettysburg to-day one can see bullet marks of the famous battles on the board fences and on the older houses. But very few are those who remember the battle so vividly as this little lady on main street.

Bellevue Vocational School is a Benefit to Many

Program Developed for Youth Who Have Been Found in Transient Camps Very Successful.

The Bellevue Vocational School was opened in December, 1934 by the Nebraska Transient Division of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, for a specific purpose. It was recognized that an adequate program for youths was needed, and that many youths leaving school since the depression had had no employment, received no training, and in many instances had formed no work habits. In December, 1935, the school was transferred to W.P.A. and has continuously operated as a vocational training project since.

The school is situated ten miles south of Omaha on a bluff overlooking the Missouri, and was originally a Presbyterian college. Accommodation is available for 200 students, with an average enrollment of 125. Youths assigned to the school are all taken from relief rolls and certified as eligible for W.P.A. projects, and are required to carry out work details as allocated in service departments or on public projects. Students are carefully interviewed by case worker and vocational advisers in an effort to see that they are placed in courses most suitable to their needs, having in view past education, natural inclination, and ambition for the future.

Courses in operation are as follows:

Kitchen—Preparation of food, cooking, kitchen management, etc.
Boiler Room—Boiler firing and stationary engineering.
Laundry—General commercial laundry work.

Truck Gardening—Cultivation and care of produce, etc.
Cabinet Shop—Practical training in use of tools and work methods. This department has turned out all office furniture, including desks, chairs, cabinets, and all tables and benches used in the school and other work camps. A uniformly high standard of work has been turned out by this department.

Sheet Metal Shop—Practical tin work, including developments and making of patterns. All tin work for camp construction and maintenance, dish washing tanks, ventilators, etc., have been produced in this shop.

Welding—Practical acetylene welding courses.
Bookbinding—All phases of book-binding.

Journalism and Printing—Practical journalism and production of school magazine and daily news sheet.

Commercial Art—Instruction in all phases, lettering, poster design, layout, etc., with study of fine art and painting as a spare-time activity. It will be observed that service departments are utilized to give training on a joint work-and-training basis. In addition to the practical work done in the shops, it is mandatory for all students in the mechanical trades to take blueprint reading, mechanical drawing, and mathematics.
