YOUTH SKILLED VIOLIN MAKER

LORAIN, O. (UP)—Young John Varos, employed at the National Tube company, showed his foreman a tiny 7-inch fiddle he had been making in his spare time. The foreman was impressed with the expert workmanship.

"Why don't you make big ones?" he asked.

Varos took the suggestion and since has been spending his time making full-sized violins.

The 28-year-old amateur violin-maker has been working in his cellar workshop, turning out professional-sized instruments with a simple set of tools which he values at only $20.

Recently, Varos completed work on a Stradivarius model, which experts say has the tone and quality of a factory-made violin Varos bought years ago for $67. It is said to have the liquid fullness which might be accredited to a veteran instrument craftsman.

At present, Varos is carving the necks and scrolls of two more Stradivarius models. Now that he has a certain source of income from his regular job, he hopes to complete each instrument in three weeks' time.
