Improvements Nearing Completion. The coal chutes which the Missouri Pacific are just now installing in their yards for the handling of coal for the engines of the road, are to be modern in every respect when it comes to rapidly handling fuel for the locomotives. The chutes, which are costing a nice bit of money, are expected to pay for themselves as it saves hiring a number of men required to handle the fuel which will now be done at a minimum cost. The coal is broken to four inch sizes, and is handled by the stoker process, being elevated to the top of the tower and loaded into the tank or tender of the engines. It is then handled by a stoker system which are and have been in use on the larger of the Missouri Pacific engines and other engines will be so equipped.
