Bible School Lesson Study!

Sunday, June 25 By L. Neitzel, Murdock, Neb.

"Paul Reviews His Life" (Phil. 1:12-14, 21, 24; 3:12-14; 2 Tim. 5:7, 8) It is a pathetic story we review today. The narrator is the greatest Christian that ever lived. Paul felt the end near, and for strengthening and encouraging his brethren he gives a resume of his life since Jesus converted him, near Damascus. The recounting of his sufferings for the Gospel's sake, may look to some as boasting, but he was driven to it by his detractors, who tried to belittle him, and undermine his influence. In reviewing his sufferings, we have his word, they are not all accounted for by the historian. But no one will doubt his truthfulness. He speaks in self-defense. A man near death does not tell lies. There is no record of his vision and revelation in Chap. 12: 1-4. Figuring from his writing 2 Cor. in 57 A. D. 14 years back, it must have occurred about 43 A. D. What Paul saw and heard was "unspeakable." It was such a revelation as no other man ever experienced. "He was a chosen vessel." Then he speaks of the "thorn in his flesh." What the affliction was we shall never know here; but we make this assertion, that it was memory. When he was successful in his labors (and he was) the adversary would bring the scenes of his former persecutions of the Christians, and especially the death of Stephen to his memory, which must have been very painful to his sensitive soul; prayer did not avail—but God said: "Grace will be given thee to bear it"—or he might have become proud, because of the special revelations he received. Relating in his letter to the Philippians that his imprisonment and the restrictions placed upon him, by which his enemies thought to hinder—yes even kill the progress of the Gospel—has worked out to the opposite way, for the whole army, in whose charge Paul was, to whom he preached, it became known that he was an inoffensive, innocent man, but a great preacher; this brought great joy and comfort to the church, who grew bold and preached without fear. That was a great victory for the cross. Then Paul comes to relate his personal attitude to Christ. Here he bares his heart to the church as nowhere else; it is a relationship to Christ that every child of God should experience, anything short of that is unsatisfactory. "For me to live is Christ." Probably no phase of seven words anywhere in the Bible presents a more perfect, comprehensive, character-moulding ideal than these words of Paul, and the man or woman who truly lives them is surely the fullest rounded of all Christians. Here are different types and characters: "For me to live is wealth"—the philosopher; "For me to live is knowledge"—the militarist; "For me to live is fame." But Paul says: Neither wealth nor knowledge, nor fame, for me to live is Christ. Christ the origin of my life—the model of my life—the aim of my life—the reward of my life. "To die is gain." Relief from distress, sorrow, pain, death would bring Paul relief—that would be gain. But here is a problem: Should he choose relief from all earthly troubles—or continue to labor and suffer? He leaves it with God. That will be done. Paul had just set forth the absolute centrality of Christ in his own life, and how he gave up everything, counting all for nothing, that he might really win Christ, be found in him, know him and all the power of the resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings. He has not reached the goal. He is not satisfied with the progress made, but he is pressing on in the race, to a greater knowledge, a deeper apprehension, a clearer resemblance to his master. A close examination should be made by every Christian in regard to the progress he makes—or losing ground. Questions like these should be asked often by Christians: Are we making progress? Are we standing still? Are we losing ground? What were our habits a year ago in respect of prayer, communion, Bible study? What are they now? "I have fought the good fight (See 1 Tim. 6:12). Compare Acts 20:24; Gal. 2:2. Paul had no easy time, gave himself to no pleasure of the world; but his course was one ordained of God, who has him allowed to finish it, and he rejoiced in the fact that he never denied the faith—kept it as a precious treasure entrusted to him. Let us run the race set before us (Heb. 12:1); so fight, not as one that beateh the air (1 Cor. 9:26). Now he can look confidently to his crowning—"that day" is drawing near. That oft bruised body will soon be at rest, the victor's crown will be placed on his head, by Him whom he has so faithfully served. Welcome home—enter into the joy of thy Lord!
