NOTICE TO QUIT

To Mary, standing grimly ready for action with her broom in one hand and her pail of sawdust in the other. It was a sign of mental and moral weakness for a teacher to remain in her room one minute after the dismissal bell rang.

To Miss Bird, breathing in the freedom of those welcome minutes, it was a glorious opportunity for personal talks with delinquents for rummaging through table drawers and lingering over droll compositions. Sometimes she even sat for a minute or two in utter idleness, just to look at empty seats and fancy their owners' faces, misty and dim above them.

Miss Bird loved her work. Mary loved her work, too. But Mary loved hers for the speed with which it could be accomplished and unfortunately Mary's work began only when Miss Bird's ended. If Miss Bird had not been a novice in her profession she might have discovered earlier Mary's impatience to invade her domain. But in her innocence she failed to do so.

The great cloud of dust that poured ominously from the dressing room as soon as the children had marched away irritated her nostrils or evoked a sneeze. It never impressed her as the shadow of a coming event or set her to thinking of the unswept room. The intermittent uproar in the corridor brought a fleeting thought that the mop or broom in use there must be badly worn down, but she never interpreted that thumping as the herald of the approach of her rightful successor. Each succeeding night still found her sitting at her desk.

Once, as she was leaving the building at a quarter after 4, she fancied that Mary looked troubled. Miss Bird smiled to her.

Then Mary spoke solicitously. "Ain't you ever afraid of gettin' cold, sittin' in that chilly room?"

"Well, the temperature does go down," replied Miss Bird, "but I don't mind much."

"It's the worst thing you could do after bein' in the heat all day," Mary assured her solemnly.

"Perhaps she's right," Miss Bird reflected as she left the building. "I must get the habit of leaving early."

On the car going home Miss Bird thought with gratification of the look of anxiety on Mary's face. What a lot of unsuspected sympathy the world held for us, after all! And Mary was right, Miss Bird told herself. Sitting in that cold room was most unwise.

But the next evening there were reports to be made out and she did not care to take them home. She had been at work on them for a half hour when she heard some one fumbling at her door with a key. Through the glass she recognized Mary's head studiously bent. As the teachers lock their doors before leaving, the sweepers are provided with pass keys. Mary was using hers now.

Miss Bird rose and stepped toward the door. Mary looked up in surprise, then opened the door and put her head in.

"I beg your pardon. I thought you was gone." She halted. "The other teachers are keeping scholars," she added significantly. "I didn't see no scholars here."

"I'll be gone in just a few minutes, now," said Miss Bird.

"All right. Then, if you don't mind, I like to be putting the sawdust around while I'm waiting."

Mary distributed the sawdust with such vigor that Miss Bird had to move with some dexterity to escape it.

For several days after that Miss Bird departed as soon as she could gather together her possessions. In doing so she had no thought of Mary. She had simply come to the conclusion that remaining after hours was somehow unwholesome. She began to take a pride in leaving early.

Then came the last day of the week, and with it complaints of her ranks. Mutiny was afoot. So 3:30 found her facing the occupants of four front seats. They were acknowledged law breakers, every one, but they had to be dealt with reasonably. This matter was complicated by the fact that all four versions of the tort for which they were held differed radically. It was still further intensified by a deafening noise from the corridor. Indeed it seemed that the last word of every well directed question was lost in a terrific vibration of sound waves just outside the room.

Miss Bird was puzzled. The whacks seemed to indicate careful aim and regularity of stress, but they were not those of an ordinary hammer. It was probably some necessary piece of carpentering, but it was most unfortunate.

She bore it as long as she could. Then with a throbbing head, she dismissed the disorderly four and went into the dressing room for her wraps.

Her dressing room door, leading into the hall, was opened. As she stood whisking the dust from her hat, she heard the voice of one of the other sweepers from the landing just above them.

"What the matter, Mary?"

Mary was now at the other end of the hall. "Oh, I'm stung again! Stung on every room!" Miss Bird heard Mary say between thumps, "but I guess this pettin' 'ull soon get 'em all out!"

For a moment Miss Bird flushed. Then she leaned back wearily against the door and laughed.
