Prayer Each Day

I prayed unto the Lord, my God, and made my confession.—Dan. 9:4. Everliving, everloving God, our heavenly Father, we bless and praise Thee for Thy gifts to the human race in families for its higher development and its greater influence. This morning we bless Thy holy name that we have been called into this family now before Thee in prayer.

May we gratefully recognize our duty and responsibility. Thee, and to one another, and to this community.

Keep us this day from sin, as we do the tasks of the day. Watch Thou over us and guard us from danger. Teach us how to live unselfishly, each for the home, in all the little things of the home.

May we, as father and mother, as brothers and sisters, fulfill our tasks to each and to all, with the blessed example of our Elder Brother always before our minds.

Prosper the work of each one of us, and the labors and business of all our neighbors. Grant, above all, to our family the real and abiding prosperity of a rich and helpful faith in our Lord and Master, to Whom be praise, and glory, now and forever. Amen.

L. D. WOLF, D.D., Baltimore, Maryland.

Parents' Problems

Should children be permitted to borrow and lend books? When children are taught to reverence books as they should, and they become as friends to them, many borrowing and lending difficulties disappear. With this reverence comes a desire to protect their own books, and also those of their friends. The stories they most love they naturally desire to share with others. They do so; and without knowing it, they are learning the principles of co-operation and exchange which will be of assistance later, in the larger relationships of life. To deny them this would be to withhold from them and their playmates a real gift.

My Marriage Problems

Adele Garrison's New Phase of "REVELATIONS OF A WIFE" (Copyright 1922)

What Lillian Told Mother Graham That Made Her an Ally at Once. With fingers perceptibly trembling with excitement, Mother Graham undid her fancy handbag, drew her cherished hat from it, and looked it over critically.

"It isn't hurt a bit," she said magnanimously. "But, Margaret," pattingly, "you needn't mind sewing up the rip. I prefer to do that myself. And," there was just a hint of resentment in her voice now, "I don't mind saying that if you'd only trusted me a little and had asked me to sew the paper into the hat, I would have been glad to do it. Then there would have been no need for all this flub dubbery."

"I know," Lillian's voice was meekly deprecating. "But, you see, the necessity arose one day when you were away, and besides at that time an oath of secrecy had been taken—you understand."

A Mocking Tribute. All the resentment fled from Mother Graham's delighted face.

"Oh, yes!" she said. "Well! I'm glad my poor old hat was able to help a little. Good night."

She picked up her handbag and swept through the door which Allen Drake sprang to open for her. As he closed the door behind her he swept Lillian a mocking bow.

"How's the poor old truth-telling conscience?" he asked. "It must be groggy. But I wish to make you obeisance, Milady. That was a most artistic performance. Old Machiavelli's dust must be stirring uneasily in its crypt about now."

Katherine's hurriedly penciled memoranda of the code used by Joe and Anton, and to Allen Drake the eye-glass case, lifting the ingenious lining as she did so and exposing the thin white papers beneath.

"Nothing More Tonight." My eyes were drawn irresistibly to Allen Drake. He is at his best when any unusual problem is given him, and I always have been oddly fascinated in watching his transformation from an indolent, elegant posturer to the keen, ruthless, almost bloodhound-like personality which he becomes when he is on a mental trail.

He took the papers from the lining, felt one, sniffed at it, and held it up to the light. To my imagination, his eyes seemed to be narrowed to pin points, his whole face appeared sharpened, and its natural pallor was accentuated. Then he held out case and papers to my father, and spoke with his customary drawl:

"These ought to afford a good time to all, chief."

"Also these," my father returned, giving him Katherine's memoranda.

Mr. Drake read the hastily-scribbled papers attentively, and looked across at Lillian.

"The old stuff, with but a little variation, eh?" he said with a smile. "It's a wonder they wouldn't invent something new after a while."

"I fancy that little variation may give even you a few strenuous seconds," she said a bit spiritedly.

"Perhaps," he returned, and then my father rose, spoke with decision. "Nothing more tonight!" he said.

"I simply wanted to get those into Allen's hands, for he wakes at some unearthly hour in the morning, works a while and then goes to sleep again. Now, daughter, dear, I want one thing of you. Take this—" held out the memorandum which had been hidden in Mother Graham's hat—and get Katie to reproduce as nearly as possible the copy she made. And now, good night." He kissed me, and Lillian and I went away together. As we went up the stairs she whispered with the first bit of malice I ever had heard from her:

"Did you hear Allen's spiel about that code? That lad is getting insufferably conceited. I wish—"

She abruptly switched her sentence to a trivial comment upon the chilliness of the night. But I guessed that she had mentally echoed Katie's wish and mine concerning Allen Drake.

When cooking very sour fruits add a very little salt and less sugar will be necessary.

Don't experiment any longer. I know this will heal that rash because I've tried it!
