Library Chats

Uncle Sam knowing that education does not stop when school days end has issued twenty splendid lists of books for home reading. The titles cover a wide range of interesting subjects and are so well chosen that the young and old alike are amused as well as instructed. The library has the following lists supplied by the government for its patrons: Great Literary Histories, Ancient, Medieval and Modern; Miscellaneous Reading Course for Parents, Reading Course for Boys, Reading Course for Girls, Thirty Books of Great Fiction, Thirty World Heroes, American Literature, Thirty American Heroes, American History, France and Her History, Heroes of American Democracy, The Call of the Blue Waters, Iron and Steel, Dante, Shipbuilding, Machine Shop Work, Foreign Trade, Master Builders of Today, and Twenty Good Books for Parents. All who complete the score or more of books in each list receive an official certificate from the government and Uncle Sam has sent out over 60,000 lists a month since these courses were first compiled.

The children who have library cards are commencing to gather material for the Essay Contest that will be held during Children's Book Week November 12 to November 18. The subject is, "Books I Like and Why," and all stories must be given to the librarian by the 31st of October and have 500 words or more. Ula Echols, the children's librarian at the Omaha Public Library, has prepared the following list of books that might give inspiration for this book story contest. Little Women by Alcott, Tom Sawyer by Clemens, Robinson Crusoe by Defoe, Hans Brinker by Dodge, Alice in Wonderland by Dodgson, Land of the Lost Night by DuChailu, Adventures of Billy Toppsail by Duncanson, Boys Life of Roosevelt by Hagedorn, Treasure Island by Stevenson, and History with a Match by Van Loon.

My Marriage Problems

By ADELE GARRISON.

With fingers deft and speedy, Lillian helped me prepare the sandwiches for which Allen Drake had asked. Then I poured the coffee intended for Smith into a vacuum bottle and put it and the sandwiches, wrapped in a napkin, on a tray.

"There," I said, in a tone which I am afraid registered distaste for my task.

"I know," Lillian said sympathetically. "It's a pill to prepare food and drink for that beast out there. You'd much rather brew him some nice poison like that with which he tried to kill you. But it's in a good cause, my dear, and you've done it beautifully. Now for this coffee tray. Coffee pot—hot water—pot—cream—sugar—cups and saucers—spoons. There—bring that over to the library, too. Lillian will come back there for it."

Characteristically, she had taken the heavier tray and had waded into the hall before I could protest. I followed her swiftly, and found Dr. Pettit making the library fire to life. The physician nodded a curt salute and Lillian gave me a silent S. O. B. above his shoulders. I crossed the room to her, and bent to her perturbed whisper.

"How many lamps for young Chester? I've been forgotten."

"Three," I whispered back with a sudden remembrance of the pleasure young Mr. Chester had taken in the coffee I invariably served when he had been a guest at our home. Without a home, and still mourning the loss of his mother, he had been pathetically grateful for our hospitality.

"Thank you," she dropped them in with a practiced hand, added cream judiciously and handed me the cup. "Make him drink it," she said, and I obediently crossed the room to Tom Chester's side.

A Smiling Rebuke. "Here your coffee, Mr. Chester," I said, and he looked up with a pitiful attempt at a smile.

"Thank you," he answered gratefully, stretching a shivering hand for the cup.

"He has kept it for a whole year," and so it went. There wasn't one of the neighbors that didn't claim something or other, and at last I, too, neither Uncle Jerry Chuck nor Jimmy Rabbit had anything left to carry. And then the neighbors fell back and let Uncle Jerry reach his doorway.

"It's a wonder," he spluttered. "It's a wonder somebody didn't claim my new house."

"Just then a fat woodchuck came hurrying up the hill and waddled straight up to Uncle Jerry.

"Step aside, sir!" he snarled. "I want to enter my home."

"Your home?" Uncle Jerry exploded. "That's what I said, my winter house. I'd like to know what you are doing here in my doorway."

For a moment Uncle Jerry looked as if he meant to fight. But he didn't. He edged away. The stranger was bigger than he.

"I didn't know this old burrow belonged to anybody," he stammered. "I cleaned it out; and I'm just moving in."

"You may as well go back where you came from—or dig yourself a new house," the stranger growled.

"I'll go home," Uncle Jerry muttered angrily. "Anyhow, it won't be much work to move back again."

University Professors to Lecture at Duchesne.

The largest and most successful dance of the Corinthian club during its three seasons of existence was given Wednesday evening in Shrine hall of Masonic temple. Novelty music numbers and a moonlight waltz were among the features. One hundred and seventy-five couples attended.

Problems That Perplex

No Real Romance. Dear Miss Fairfax: I am 31. Have gone out with not more than six men in these 21 years and not more than three times, if that many, with any one of those six. I do not attend dances or parties, although I like them very much.

I visited a married brother not long ago and we had parties most of the time. At one party I met a gentleman about 42, who is my brother's office associate. I am home now and have been thinking of him ever since. I believe I am in love with him and cannot get him off my mind. My brother has been away from home since I was born.

Don't you know many men and have no real romance in your life, so you are fastening your longings on this man, of whose character, tastes and ideals you know nothing. He is over twice your age. You are not likely to be congenial. If you know him better you could feel the force of the fact that you belong to different generations. With nothing on which to build, you are merely an episode in passing. If you confide in your brother, I am sure he will be able to help and guide you.

Dear Miss Fairfax: I do not come from a very good family. I do not go out much because I do not have any really intimate friends, but I want to know all about etiquette. Do you know where I could secure any books on etiquette I could read? My parents are not very well-to-do; that is why I want them cheap. Do you know the best way to get with nice high school pupils? "No one," Tom Chester's voice rang out, all his dislike of Allen Drake strengthening his tones. "I am going myself as soon as the doctor does me up a bit."

Mr. Drake looked at him critically. "But this is nonsense," he said. "He cannot do anything in his condition. He is not fit to make a bolt of it. I cannot permit—"

He took the tray from Lillian's hand and stepped into the hall and was back again in an instant.

the cup I put it into his hands, but kept my own open it, and it was lucky I did so, for otherwise it would have crashed to the floor.

"Let me steady it for you," I said in matter-of-fact tones, as he finished painfully. "Here."

I slipped one hand behind his head, for I have often fed Mother Graham when she has been very weak, and with the other held the cup to his lips almost drained of color. He drank gratefully, as a thirsty child might do, but had not finished when Allen Drake came back into the room.

I saw him balk perceptibly in the doorway, then he came forward with a smearing little smile upon his lips. "What a touching tableau!" he said.

"Mrs. Underwood, you ought to paint it. Call it 'First Aid to the Injured' or something like that. Are the things ready for Smith?"

"Right here," Lillian replied, indicating the smaller tray. In her voice was a wailing accent which told me that she was incensed at Mr. Drake's discourtesy. "I thought you were going to send one of the men for this."

Her tone was a rebuke. It said plainly, "What did you leave Smith for, anyway?" That Mr. Drake understood I saw by the resentful flush in his eyes, though his voice was coolly nonchalant.

"There's one of them in the hall. The other is with the chief, guarding your friend."

He took the tray from Lillian's hand and stepped into the hall and was back again in an instant.
