In view of the demands made at Paris by the Spanish commissioners, the president has informed those who have approached him on the subject that no more regiments will be ordered to be mustered out of the service for the present. He may need every man in the ranks before the snow flies.—State Journal.

SOME war critics attach significance to the fact that no professional pugilist drifted into the army during the war, intimating that there is no fighting blood in the class. The insinuation is unjust. The profession is as valorous and patriotic as the multitude of home guards now so conspicuously shedding gobs of tears over the hardships of the soldiers.—Bee.

GENERAL WHEELER boldly announces that he enlisted in the army for the war and all the outgrowths of the war and is ready to stay in the service as long as the president thinks him useful. The contrast between General Wheeler and some of his military associates who did not get near enough to the war to smell powder is striking, to say the least.—Bee.

In the midst of all the worry about camp and soldiers, President McKinley has the satisfaction of knowing that he has conducted a grand and successful war, and that all the so-called mistakes are mere motes in the sunbeam of achievement which shall illuminate in future years a glorious page in the world's history. Every American knows this, is proud of it, and will be prouder as time passes.—Chicago Record.

TAKE a thousand railroad men and keep track of them for a year the way soldiers are watched, note the mortality rate and be surprised. More people are killed in a year on the railroads of the world than are killed in the wars of the world. And yet but few eulogize the brave railroaders and many people never give them a passing thought. There is a gainful pursuit, and notwithstanding their vigilance and care preserves the lives of patrons of the road, little attention is paid to the high death rate.—Jouanal.

The engineer on No. 76, Wednesday morning, seemed to find gleeful satisfaction in running down Agent Enlow's drove of fancy porkers, and it was easily done, too, as they are not of the sprinter variety any more than he is. No damage was done, however, outside of cutting three corners and the front end off of one of the ham-sprouters. So he is "not so swell" as "there are others."
