GAINS THE VICTORY ON FIFTH BALLOT

Strong man at start and gains with each vote-Republicans make a record for prompt and harmonious work.

Hastings, June 40.—(Special).—Judge G. W. Norris won in one of the prettiest free-for-all political races ever run in the Fifth congressional district. Victory came to him on the fifth ballot, after the record had been made, but not announced. Phelps county started the break, and

The convention was the largest republican congressional meeting ever "is now the widest read newspaper in called together in the district. The parquette of the Kerr opera house was nearly filled with delegates and every county in the district was represented. It was harmonious in every act. The predictions of the delegates were such as to make the winning candidate feel that his election would surely follow. The struggle, though strenuous, was not bitter. Judge Norris was called out and made a speech and he thanked the delegates and made known the sterling quality of his republicanism. He was escorted to the chair by two of his defeated rivals, Messrs, Adams and Prince, who vote of the convention, 63. The Beach at Hyde Park.

The beach scarcely meets one's expectations. We look to see a stretch of clean, white sand with waves rolling in from a limitless horizon and breaking soundingly upon the water-line. We see, instead, beyond a paved street and a cement side-walk, several vacant city lots, covered with a growth of unkept trees and under-brush and weeds, and hummocky with heaps of rubbish, broken bricks and bottles, tin cans and ashes, that have been dumped here to raise the level of the track. A few houses have already been built, facing not the lake, but the city, costly structures fronted by lawns and shaded by trees. A crib of piling filled with broken rock holds the waves in check and prevents the water from eating the shore away. The timbers of which it is formed came from northern forests, where once the trees grew almost as close together as the piles are now set. Cut from the soil that sustained them, stripped of every vestage of green they were transplanted in this strange land. Their tops that once waved gladly in the light are buried now in the slimy shadowless glooms of Lake Michigan. Behind the break-water is an inlet or basin in which fishermen's boats and small pleasure crafts find safe refuge from storms. A narrow, verdureless strip of sand, strewn with rounded pebbles and clam shells and drift lies between the water's edge and the fringe of RESOLVED, That we reaffirm the principles adopted by the national convention held at Sionx Falls, South Dakota, in 1900.

No women dwell hereonly men, whom one sees busied about the only household duty that a man considers indispensable, cooking over the small stove whose stove-pipe chimney, projecting through the roof, sends a blue curl of smoke upwards. Sharp reports as of canonading, startle them from their sleep when the restless, swelling surface cracks the frozen crust. The piles and piers are thick-coated with ice. The water in the basin is solid to its depths. The lake beyond, for miles from land will bear the weight of skaters, but none come to this dreary spot. The surface is heaved, as by volcanic action, into uneven mounds and ridges. The lighthouse far out in the desert of ice stands alone like a butte on the prairie. At night flames from the chimneys of blast furnaces in South Chicago flush the southern sky. Dismantled boats, half buried by the snow, lie well above reach of the storm-driven waves. The wind sounds mournfully through the tree tops. Last autumn's leaves are blown raspingly over the hard ground. A depressing desolation grasps the landscape in a merciless grip.
