The Contest Over the Payne Bill.

SENATOR WARREN.

IN securing the report to both houses of congress of a tariff bill containing many important reductions from present schedules of customs duties the Taft administration is considered to have scored a notable victory. President Taft stood out for placing on the free list certain raw materials largely used in manufacture, and in bringing the conferees pretty near to his point of view on this subject and in securing important reductions in the duties placed on some other articles entering largely into general consumption he is credited with having carried out a considerable part of his program.

The five items which the president desired especially to have on the free list were hides, oil, coal, lumber and iron ore. He was not allowed to have his way on all of these items, but secured the placing of some on the free list and the reduction of duties from senate rates on others. The fight in the conference room was chiefly over hides, lumber, coal and iron ore. Oil was admitted from the first to be a proper subject for the free list in view of the strong sentiment in both houses in favor of such a plan. The proposal to place coal on the free list and perhaps iron ore aroused Senator Elkins of West Virginia in particular, and it was owing in part to his influence that a small duty was placed upon each in the conference report. The controversy over hides was the most stubbornly fought of all, the opposition in the senate to this part of the administration program being especially strong. The anti free hides men included the senators from a number of the cattle growing states of the west like Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Utah and the Dakotas. To overcome the opposition of this element proved a difficult task, and it was in the effort to do this that the proposal was made to offset the placing of hides on the free list by making proportionate reductions in the duties on leather manufactures, particularly boots and shoes and harness.

Senator Aldrich informed senators from northwestern states that he would not consent to the abolition of the duty on hides unless there was a material cut in the rates on boots and shoes and other leather goods. In no other way, he said, could he get the votes necessary for the adoption of the report in the senate if it carried free hides. Senators from cattle raising states insisted that the only way consumers can get any benefits from the removal of protection on hides would be by corresponding reductions in the duties on boots and shoes and harness. The discussion over the hides schedule has aroused some warm blood, and there have been many varying statements about the effect of a duty on hides. Advocates of making them free claimed that the beef packers are engaging largely in the tanning business and that a duty on hides would virtually give them a monopoly on the article and result in large increases in prices of manufactured leather products. Senator Francis E. Warren of Wyoming, who has been a leader among the anti free raw material senators, maintained that the facts did not bear out such an assumption. He cited figures purporting to show that the three largest packers in the United States tan annually 1,250,000 hides, this number representing only 7 per cent of the entire domestic consumption. He denied that the beef packers could control the leather market.

As soon as the Republican conferees reached an agreement on schedules the completed and corrected tariff bill was sent to the public printer to put in shape for the use of the conferees. Then followed the reporting of the bill to the senate and house of representatives and the beginning of the debate upon its adoption.

Previous to this both houses adopted the concurrent resolution directing the president to forward to the respective states the proposed income tax amendment to the United States constitution. If thirty-five states ratify the income tax amendment it will make possible a national tax on all incomes, from whatever source derived, including the incomes of absentee Americans.
