JADE AS MEDICINE.

Used as Remedy for Many Complaints
by Chinese Physicians.

Everything in China of any rarity is quite certain to be dragged into the pharmacopoeia of the Chinese physician. Jade is one exception to the rule, says Prof. Herbert A. Giles, in the Nineteenth Century. It may be swallowed as a powder, or in little pieces the size of hemp seed, for various stomacic complaints; even pockmarks and scars may be obliterated by being daily rubbed with a piece of pure jade. It is also considered to be of a very moist nature, and we read of an imperial favorite of the eighth century who was cured of excessive thirst by holding a fish shaped jade in her mouth. And so when the tomb of the great commander, Ts'ao Ts'ao, third century, A. D., was opened 200 years after his death, among the usual objects found in such circumstances was a large silver bowl full of water. That the water had not dried up was accounted for by the presence in the bowl of a jade boy three feet in height.

Jade is chiefly brought from the K'un-lun, or Koulgun, range, between the Desert of Gobi and Tibet; from Khoten or Ilchi in Yarkand, and from Lan-t'ien on the Belurtagh mountains, still further to the west. This Lan-t'ien has been confused by the Chinese writers with another Lan-t'ien, in the Province of Shen-Se, near the city of Hsi-an, whither the Chinese court fled in August, 1900, upon the relief of Peking. In the tenth century A. D., the latter was actually known as the Jade Hills district, though it does not appear that any jade has ever been found there.
