President Crawford of the senior law class must face impeachment proceedings next Saturday. The action is brought on the grounds that he refused to call a meeting of the class after all the preliminary proceedings as required by the constitution had been completed. His accusers say that his action was arbitrary and without warrant in law, therefore they are going to try to oust him from his high and mighty position. Rumors are rampant that President Crawford will not defend the case but will treat it as factional and beneath his notice.

Last year Professor Chatburn and his class in "The Strength of Materials" discovered some serious defects in an attachment to the testing machine which is intended to draw automatically a curve indicating the relation of the stress to the deformation of the test-piece. These defects formed the subject of a paper sent by Professor Chatburn to Buffalo to be read before the convention of the American society for the advancement of science last June. It is interesting to note in the proofs of the society's "proceedings," forwarded for correction, that the inventor of the apparatus disagrees with the author of the paper but offers no adequate explanation.
