The faculty is against cheating and "cribbing" in examinations. So are we, but what good does that do as long as no action is taken? If one student sees another cheating in an examination he knows better than to "squeal" because he realizes that under conditions as they exist the "squealer" will come out of the ordeal showing more scars than will the cheat. The attitude of the faculty is no doubt the proper one but why has the condition become so serious before some definite action has been taken? Students go so far as to make open statements, probably unfounded, that in some classes as many as seventy-five per cent of the students are stealing their grades in one way or another.

If nothing definite is done or if nothing of consequence can be done by the faculty, is it out of the question to believe that the students themselves will soon get together in a mass meeting and formulate some plan or plans which will aid in abolishing such disgraceful practices? Surely after such a meeting has been held any student formerly addicted to the habit, for it is a habit and a bad one, will be ashamed to have any of his acquaintances catch him in an act condemned by the student body.

Some schools have the honor system developed to the point where any student caught "cribbing" or cheating is immediately asked to leave the institution and if he fails to act upon the suggestion, is expelled. That, of course, is what some would call an ideal situation and more than we can expect here at this time, but what is wrong with bettering the situation as best are able?

The Forum is open for the expression of ideas on the above subject. Why not work up a sentiment against the practice? Students may then be ashamed to cheat in the coming examinations.
