WANTED—A GOOD SAMARITAN

One of Nebraska's most prized traditions from the point of view of entertainment and mirth. University Night is in danger of striking a snag. Indeed, the snag seems already to have been struck, and unless someone comes to the rescue, the students will be deprived of their annual evening of good-natured fun. The committee in charge of the production, in spite of all efforts, can find no place to stage the affair. The city auditorium in late years has been used, but the fire chief, in enforcing an old ordinance that a production cannot be staged without an asbestos curtain, has eliminated that possibility, for the building has no fire-proof curtain. So far it has not been possible to secure a hall, theater or suitable building of any kind.

University Night is the one time of the year when convention is set aside to some extent, making it possible to direct good-natured jokes at all faculty members and students. No one is exempt. Then everyone has the opportunity to see himself as others see him. All foibles and weaknesses are pointed out in a pitiless fashion, but no one takes offense for it is not done maliciously. On that night, Sigma Delta Chi issues The Evening Sun, the university's annual scandal sheet, which tops the evening's fun. In the last decade University Night has come to be regarded as one of the school's most representative affairs and one of its most enjoyable. Many of the people of Lincoln have come to look forward to the evening also. It is hoped that a building may be offered that the school may not be obliged to forego this enjoyable affair.

THE RECENT COLLEGE REFERENDUM

From different standpoints the recent college referendum in regard to the peace treaty and the league of nations has been exceedingly interesting and has realized profitable results.

In the first place, it is significant that leading statesmen and politicians of the country viewed with interest, one might say in some cases perhaps with trepidation, the outcome of the vote. It is a new thing when politicians take cognizance of the opinion of college students on national affairs.

An outstanding feature has been the comment of the press. Scarcely a newspaper throughout the country that has not devoted its columns to the event, both editorially and from the news standpoint.

And, what is vastly important, a valuable lesson in citizenship has been learned. The ballot was not confined to those over twenty-one, but was extended to every college man and woman. Those under age have received training in voting. Students who perhaps had never given serious thought to the peace treaty and league question because it seemed so far removed from them, when they learned that their opinion was wanted, studied the matter thoroughly, giving it their most intelligent consideration. There is no doubt that the referendum has stimulated thought on national issues on the part of America's young citizens.

THE VOCATIONAL CONFERENCE

"To bring all the students into contact with different kinds of work or with specialized branches of work in which they are already interested; to inform students of the possibilities of their chosen vocation; and to facilitate the change from student work to the same or similar work in actual business" is the purpose of a vocational conference for both men and women to be held at the University of Wisconsin next month.

Formerly the conference was an annual event conducted by and for university women under the auspices of the Women's Self-Governing Association. The recognized need for similar work among the men caused the affair to be changed to include men as well as women. On the program will appear nationally prominent educators interested in various phases of vocational work. After the address a special program of round table discussions will be carried out for those sufficiently interested to form groups desirous of personal help and information from the speakers.

Such a conference should prove of immense benefit to university students, especially to those who have not yet decided what they want to do after leaving college. Students without an objective may be furnished the needed incentive to finish their college course. When the undergraduate has selected a goal he can then concentrate his attention on courses which will help him attain it, and not fritter away his time on non-essential subjects.

PILING UP THE WORK

Much comment has been heard on the campus about the piled-up "last minute" work of this semester, and as usual, all students are experiencing some of this inconvenience. The student who leaves work to be done in a rush the last week of the semester certainly does himself and the course an injustice. The man or woman who goes to college with the idea of really developing himself, rarely neglects his studies, and although he may receive no more credit than the one who studies at intervals and never actually finishes anything, he has the satisfying feeling of having done the work well. Moreover he has gained real knowledge and moral training. It is a well known fact that "rush work" and "cramming" is not successful as far as an education is concerned, and the student who does it is usually taking the course merely because of a requirement or for credit.

But it is equally unjust to the students and professors to postpone assigning subjects for papers, extra laboratory, special note-books and quizzes until the last week. Demands of all courses are necessarily greater now than earlier in the year, so the additional requirements sometimes over-tax the students. As a result, often the most conscientious ones submit papers and examinations which are not to their credit and which lower the semester record. Naturally every professor considers his course very important and wishes to emphasize the value of a well-rounded, broad and well-informed view-point of the work in his department, but often an over-dose of knowledge along several lines all at once, does more harm than good. A situation like this makes the last few weeks of each semester a very heavy burden for the university students.

THE DAILY DITTY

by
Gayle Vincent Grubb

Since this is the final day of bliss
I feel no gossips due
For we're soon to cram for the cursed exam
That is due in a day or too
Bat at that I've got this much to say
And I hope we once agree Concerning the gents that sit on the fence
And chuckle aloud with glee.

It must be keen when you've gone all through
The volumes of musty books
And got your degree and your life is as free
As a bunch of progressive crooks,
To be able to once more drift on back
To the hours full of grief
And knock all joys from the girls and boys
While you sigh a sigh of relief.

To dictate lessons hours long
And quiz them every day,
To get 'em scared, when they're not prepared
And ask how they got that way,
But just between a few of us
I'll state the way I think
And if what I say don't hit your way
We've wasted all this ink.

I say that he with the up-town style
Who knows why white is white
Who can tell you lead is the same as bread
And prove to you he's right
Is a little to good for you and I
And yet there's this concern
No matter how old, how long in the fold
You are never too old to learn.

A DARK HORIZON

"There is an accepted time and place for every good thing," said our old friend Socrates. This week that thing which looms up over the horizon is "exams." Already there is a noticeable decline in the stream of "co-eds" who meet daily on the library steps for prospective cokes and perfectos. There are no pleasure seeking youngsters or idlers flirting over encyclopedias. No more "sluffers" making dates to "play around." All is quiet in the library. A serious business-like atmosphere reigns over the campus and class-rooms.

There is also a last attempt to get in good with the teachers. A confidential word after class, a hard luck tale, or an asking over to the house for dinner. Also a straining of every nerve for the coming "exam." But why all this sudden change of heart? The answer is "exams."
